ELLERY QUEEN'S MYSTERY MAGAZINE

Joh Sall Lov The

Love-is-a-Hist The Doeth Per Le Chetesu de Geteway Men The Metive A Gase for De nomere heeth Fedifica Enigma heteau de l'Arrotic may Money detire so for Deduction Leuisa Denni deno Jesonder O. Outlier, ResiCORNELL WOOLING.

LISSLIC CHARTERY
JOSEPH SHEARING
ROY VICKERS
GEORGES SHEMON
THOMAS WALEN
FONALD SHOO
P, SHIEL B JOHN OAWSWOOTH
MIRIAM BRUCE
SH GURSLEE & RUFERT HUGHES
SH GURSLEE & RUFERT HUGHES

and night reigns always, there is no knowledge and no escape in the printed word. In the past, the blind bave been shut off from the riches of reading. Now there is Braille for some of them, and something else, even easier, for the majority.

No more than one quarter of the blind in this country are bale to read Barille papilly—the remaining three-quarters can experience the inestimable benefits of literature only by hearing it read also deep for the three-quarters, the American Printing House for the Blind has developed Talking Records, on which are available as wide variety of books and two single which are available as wide variety of books and two singless. The Reader's Digest and Ellery Queen's Mystery Measutine.

The lose-playing Talking Records are available to the billion of 28 libration in regional centers, and may be borrowed, postage free, by mail. Talking Book machines for playing the special recording for the billion are provided by the Unified States Covernment on a free loan basis to the billion through state agencies for the billion dure opposition of Congress underwrites absort the results of Congress. The Library of Congress underwrites absort the entire operation, with the exception of The Reader's Digital, and its budget is limited. We feel that there should be soor magazines in the program. But since the budget will not allow it, we are proud that we have been selected, prouder of that than of any other honors we have ever received.

ELLERY QUEEN'S MYSTERY MAGAZINE

ELLERY QUEEN'S MYSTERY MAGAZINE

The Little Decree in Le Château de L'Arshnic	Georges Sinsenson
The Same in Salt on His Tail	Leslie Charetris
Dacks in GETAWAY MONEY	Thomas Walsh
Unde Questus's replies in A Case for Deduction	M. P. Shiel & John Gawmonth
JOHNNY ON THE SPOT	Cornell Woolrich 1
CRIME STORIES

THE THERE IS GONE Falton Oursler & Ruper Hughes

Draw Louise

Merican Brace

Jobs Dakon Correctors

The Morive Rosald Knox

Dh. Gettler, Real-Life Detective Edward D. Radio
Publisher: Loseronce E. Spisak Rottor: Effery Qu

Vol. 12, No. 60, NOVEMBER 1945. Published morably by The American Mercury, inc., as 25s as one Assaul adversarian $4.00 in 1/15, and its patternation, and in the quantum of the Para-diparties. United 2006 in all other countries. Indicating offer, Concept. 3/14, Editoral and Economical Selves. 2007. Engagement Assaul, the Vallet 2st. 15. Congressible 2006. All the Management of the Service Adversariant and the American American Service and Serv articular translation into take hospoting, curred for the publishers in the U.S. Gerell Braken, dans think, Whith, and all when current prostinguing as the hospotinestical Conference Braceston and Conference and Conf

He Plots Thei

TEN DAYS' WOMDER By ELLERY QUEEN

His first full-length mystery in three years. In the laste-charged Van Horn household Ellery Queen pits his wits against five strangely assorted people—only one of whom holds the key to the noted detective's strangest and most fascinating case, $2.30

He Picks Them-THE QUEEN'S AWARDS 1948

Edited by ELLERY QUEEN The prize winners in the 3rd Annual Detective Short St

Contest sponsored by Ellery Oucers's Mystery Managine Little, Brown and Company. In a world-wide contes which over 860 manuscripts were submitted or 16 remain in this stunning collection. $3

TTLE, BROWN AND COMPANY + Boston

If it's Murder you want

read A MERCURY MYSTERY

25¢ A new one at your newsstand every month

Mercury Mysteries are carefully selected by an editorial committee for their pace, literary quality and readability. Sometimes they are reprinted in full, but more often they are out to speed up the story - always, of course, with the nerwission of the author or his publisher.

The Mercuru Mustern now on sale is FATAL BRIDE

by VAN SILLER

(Originally Published under the title "The Curtain flatment") Laird knew little about Donna, the strange, beautiful girl he had married, but he was soon to learn that she moved alsons in an atmorphers of violence. First an attempt was made on his life and then a house-quest was murdered; when he probed into Donna's past, he found a queer story of her first hurband's sudden, violent death. The pattern erem noiftly clear; he was in love with a woman who seemed sery close to insanitie who verhaps was a murderess, norhans was waiting to kill again. But even in the face of such doubts he still loved her, and he struggled desperately to prove to himself that she was innocent, knowing his own life was the price he would pay for failure. (Abridged Edition)

[&]quot;Dramatic and suspenseful . . ."

BIBLIOGRAPHIC BIBBLE-BABBLE

tions to his covalusing credit. The more important of the two it the Department of Pood Bash, that fusenating bureau of Scotland Yard which has proced Mr. Viders to be the most brilliant contemporary manipulator of the "inverted" describe story. The lesser conception is that of chercal, saim fixed Fidelity Dose, one of the most accomplished lady larcentist in the factional history of crime. At the mines published HIL BETTE LIVE SHOPE TOWN: A BILLDOCKNEY (1992) we thought we had a furt claims of THE AUGUST OF THE MILLY OF AUGUST OF THE AUGUST OF THE until jatures, y seeming needs and on a reason and an arrange doth book clearly From one of our Landson bookpoons came an orange doth book clearly tilled that a serveries on violently one of the continue constance involve to the continue of personnel made the copies—and better quality binding investables pagests the true for action. Moreover and this is the amounting investables not be contracted on solution was and this is the amounting investables not be contracted on solution was credited to an author by the name of David Durham!

A transatlantic check-up through our bookscout added further mystery:

the British Mitseum of London had a record of the Durham book but it bade on record that David Durham and Roy Vickyra now one and the same person! The Durham book, however, must deposited for copyright at the British Mixeum in 1924.—elsew grant prior to the volume agoed as leftbritish may be a superior of the colour agoed as leftter of the superior of the superior of the superior of the superior of water merity a reprior. Needles to add, our original dibliquipatic early on Packlety Dore was completely inaccurate original dibliquipatic early on

Now, irrelevantly, read "The Death Position Enigma," the newest Department of Dead Ends story by Roy Vickers, alias David Durham, "The Death Position Enigma" is another excellent example of Roy Vukers's continuing mastery in the art of uriting the "inverted" desective story.

THE DEATH POSITION ENIGMA

OI FICHLIN

ANNOLD HARRHOUN, chartered as-A countra, was the kied of man you would never onice—a fusy little man, the laker of his own routine. When he dressed in the morning, he unconsciously timed his movements to those of the service maid, who was as regular as humself in her habits. He adjusted his the as the maid left the flat. He know that his breakfusy would be wairing, and that on the table would be The Times and The Daily Record.

It was a largish flat for a mao living by himself. Spare bedroom, never used, string-room, and dining-room.

From the doorway of the daningroom he could glimpse the beadlines of The Record—a glimpse that ended his uncertainty. As usual, he turned and shut the door. Only, on this particular Monday morning, he took longer over it than usual.

In that paper, ran his unspoken thought, I shall probably find that I have made the traditional mistake that leads to the gallows. It will not be possible to take evasive action. It will be possible only to preserve one's

When a respectable citizen of mild habits commits murder, his reactions are inevitably different from those of the crook who kills in the course of business. Remorse, however, is rare. Habershon's sense of sio was transferred to Webber, his victim — for controlly thrusing Habershon into the horror of committing murder, by Such precautions as he had taken against discovery had been inspired get less by fear than by a sort of moral chapter of the horror of the should fail — again, the blame must to be laid at the door of the unspeakable dd Webber.

HOUSEHOLDER SHOT DEAD,

POSITION ENIGMA.

Death position enigmal "These fellers yell themselves into sheer meaoinglessness" snorted Habersbon, and turned in disgust to The Times, where he found only a five-line paragraph. The Record carried two columns. Habershon read, at first with resignation, theo with astonishment.

"That iso't an enigma—it's an absurdity—and a lie as well!" he

He read on with the growing suspicion that someone else must have entered after he had left.

The murderer made entry by the window and left by the front door, as indicated by one-way footperns on the flower bed (photo back page) and soil trodden into the sitting-room carpes.

"But I didn't enter by the window.
... Oh yes, I did! Wheo I went back."

account. On Sunday morning, a telephone linesman had called the police to Webber's brick-built hungalow. which stood by itself on the fringe of an Essex village. A car, not that of the led to the window of the sitting room. The dead man was found sitting at his writing table. The position was so un-usual that the photographs taken by than the report, more credible than

The photographs showed a bulky man, apparently alive, leaning forholding the telephone receiver to his ear, the left elbow resting on the table. The right hand was clenched. the thumb extended downwards the right arm suspended exactly nine and one-half inches above the writing

man interrupted in a telephone conversation by the entry of a friend. While continuing to speak on the trated. Or he might have been indi-Whatever it was, the firt and the extended thumb gave an impression of a pistol shot. The body of a man who has been shot did not, he knew, behave as if the man had been suddenly frozen to death. The pose was so lifelike - one waited for the thumh to one of those statues of arrested motion - the horse with one hoof perpetually poised.

Called on the Sunday morning, tainly regarded the position of the cornse as an enigma. It made sense

"We don't know yet whether he eversaid anything on that telephone. Doctor," said Karslake, "But we know that be lifted the receiver at around nine-thirty on Saturday night. As the receiver was not replaced, the gur sounded the buzzer but not no answer. In the morning a linesman came here and - when he saw that called the local police." Karslake placed at the corose as if it were a personal insult. "Have you ever seen anything like it, Doctor?"

Not exactly like it. But you've seen freak effects vourself caused by "But it isn't a freak effect! He was doing something. Telephoning and look at that thumb! If he wasn't saving 'thumbs down' to someone, be was jamming it hard on a bell-push or something. And there's no bell-push. answer a bell, and there's no wire from this room anyway. Recor mortis can't set in within bong, can it?"

"No. The time varies very coosiderably with the state of the body. I can't give you the duration in this case — that's a job for the Home Office analyst. Strictly off the record, you can take it that rigor, sufficent to support that arm, couldn't have set in under an hour at the very sconest." "But you told me the body had not Krallake.

"Correct! I can give you this starting point, Inspector. Death would not have been instantaneous. He could have lived for about seven or eight minutes after that wound. He might not night not have been onescous for several minutes. He would be able move his arms—able to pick up the

have been able to speak intelligibly.

"At the moment of death," continued the doctor, "the left arm could have been as you see it now. But not the right arm. Definitely impossible!

The right arm must have been supposed."

The doctor's tone indicated that he could give no further belp.

"What about this, sir?" asked young Rawlings, Karslake's aide.

"The murderer comes in by the window, goes out by the front door, leaving it unlocked. He has forgotten something, comes back an bour or so a later and moves it from under the hand of the corpse?"

"Ah!" silved Karalske "You mean hand of the corpse?"

"Ah" sighed Karaiske, "You mean all we've got to do is arrest the murderee and ask him what be came back for. In the meantime, young feller, you go over the whole place and collect all the loose papers containing a name and address." the team had completed their preliminary work. In the sitting room they had found one set of fingerprints, not those of the deceased. There was a third set in the kitchen, later identified as those of a daily help. When the body bad been removed. Kaniske made a general unrey. It was a well-built base on one floor. The capet was good is own the furniture—good, moorer stuff, not see its eye but very little the worse for wear. There was wall asie which also the money for the worse for wear. There was wall asie which also to been opened, In the disswer of the writing table, unbelied, were refiered pounds. A gold eigenter case on the body of decond and it became a reasonable inference that the motive and on the property of the p

After ensuring that the staff was usefully employed, be drove to the telephone exchange and interviewed the individual girl concerned.

"The subscriber had di-alled 'Operator' and I answered in the pre-scribed form." The girl spoke as if she were answering a call. "Failing to get an apower."

"Quite so! Did you hear anything at all?"

at all?"
"No. Except a typewriter."
That was a surprise. There was no typewriter in the bungal r, "How long did the ty

"Not as much as a minute." She dropped the telephone voice. "And if it's any help, it didn't sound like proper typewriting. My sister's a typast, so I know something about it." She reflected. "It was as if someone was underfining words, only not making a single underline—you know? —putting the underline under the

The doctor had said Webber would probably have been unable to speak. Karslake borrowed a typewriter. "D'you mind turning your back on ane?" he asked the girl. "I want to get the exact noise you heard."

He tapped one key at random, several times.

"Well it's the sorr of noise only not the same, if you understand me."

Karshike tapped out three short, three long, three short—the S.O.S.

"That's it!" cried the girl. "It was exactly like that!"

He gave her fafteen tests. Each exactly like that!"

He gave her fafteen tests. Each time he tapped the signal she sported it, though it did not dawn on her that it was Moree.

The reporters did not find her until Monday morning. She gladly told ber date, and by now was able to repeat the signal, which the reporters recognized. She gaze them a good story, and in return they left her out of it, knowing that otherwise alse would be acked for talking about her job.

In the afternoon editions, Arnold Habershon learned that the death position was no longer an enigma.

It is now possible to state that the traceable to him. In his first passes, he coilently forget the typeware the typeware has would aboutly him, and reamend, as bone or more taken, to remove a like position of the arm to thus accounted for if we assume that the machine was at the month of the control of the cont

A portable typewriter! Habershon had never even-seen a portable typewriter, except in a shop window. That More code nonsense too! If the police believed all that, so much the better, for it must mean that they were nowhere near the trail.

was not fully recognized at the Exchange.

Which was true. But Habershon was bisfully unaware that a type-serrer which had played no part in the case—which did not, in fact, case—was the kind of clue that could become dangerous after it had been filed—and cross indeed under the wrong headings—in the Department of Dead Ends.

ment of Dead Ends,

Habershon found that the typewriter incident steadied his nerve. He had been most afraid of his own absent-mindedness—of leaving something which would act as a victim card. Obviously, he had not done so, or the police would have pounced by now, nearly forty-eight hours after the murder. Webber himself could have made no note. It was — yes — fourteen years since they had been in touch. In those years, Haberthon had built up a combrable practice as an accountant. His clients reparded his touch. In those years, Habershon had built up a comformable practice as an accountant. His clients regarded his anxious fussiness as an asset. He was intelligent but slow-brained, acting almost invariably on second thoughts. In those years, he knew, he had become a little raibiit of a man. At forty-three he had the personal habits of a man thirty years older. Suppose Webber had known he was being tracked? Suppose he had stowed away somewhere one of those notes: If I die by sidnene let the police look for Arnold Habershon. For unstance, had Webber perhaps been aware that his car was heing followed so often. Anxiously, he began to check up with his dary.

It was now April 7th, 1936. He turned back to an entry for February 15th. There was the one word Match. He wondered idly why he had used a key-word no one ebe would under-

He was returning after visiting a client in the City, had stood in a doorway to light a eigarette when Webber had come out of the building. It was a shock, for he had taken for granted that Webber was still in Canada—probably in jail—and would never be heard of again. Then he had seen the brass plate Rest & Webber, Manufacturers' Agests. He stepped into the building. Five rooms on the ground floor, which meant a very high reat. And the brass plate was not a new one. Evidently Webber had been prosperous and respectable for some years. It had taken him a fortnight to find

It mat taken man a bringing to Sine where Webber parked his car. These begin a bog series of failures to trail the car. Haberhols temperaments with the car. Haberhols temperaments which provides a possible of the car. Haberhols a bog series of the car. Haberhols and the car. Haberhols a bog series which a bog series a bog series which a bog series which a bog series a bog series a bog series when the car with the car. Haberhols and the car. Haberhols are series as the car. Haberhols are series as the car. Haberhols are series when the car. Haberhols are series as the car. Haberhols haberhols are series when the car. Haberhols haberhols are series when the car. Haberhols haberhols haberhols are series when the car. Haberhols haberhols haberhols are series when the car. Haberhols haberhols haberhols haberhols haberhols are series when the car. Haberhols haberhols haberhols haberhols have been series when the car. Haberhols haberhols have been series when the car. Habe

If It is intended to murder Webber, is Habershon concealed his intendent, from himself. At their last meeting, fourteen versus previously, he had attacked Webber with his fist—in the curious conviction that the may who was conscious of being in the oright always won. He was so figure in the right always won. He was so figure at the right always that his blow was remarked webber was so wrong that he was approach when his blow was realer and first prounds beging, and Habershon had good to be a supposed when the proposed beging and the proposed begins are proposed begins and the proposed begins and the proposed begins and the proposed begins are proposed begins and the proposed begins and the proposed begins and the proposed begins are proposed begins and the proposed begins are proposed begins and the proposed begins and the proposed begins and the proposed begins are proposed begins and the proposed begins are proposed begins and taken to his bed for three days.

"The man might attack me again!"
That was the way Hahenhon explained to himself that he must pocket the revolver he had carried in the Kaiser's war — a foolish act if he had intended murder, as the revolver was

w- registered in his name. he He had turned up about nine. He minutes of unfriendly conversation.

By the time he reached the front door, it had been opened.

"Good evening!" said. Webber coldly, as to a stranger who has taken a liberty.

"I want to talk to you, Webber."
"My hat, it's Arnold Habershon!

Come in, old man."

In the hall, Habershon recognized an oak chest that had once been his own - more accurately, his wife's. That was disconcerting. Webber usbered him into the sitting-room. Habershon recognized the carpet, the writing table, the chairs, the cabinet. He was thrown out of his stride.

"But this is her furniture!" be exclaimed and immediately wished he had not said it.

"Yes. I managed to save it. Your moral claim is unassailable. You can have it all if you like."

"Thanks, I don't want it." Slowbrained, he could not disentangle himself from the riddle of the furniture.

"I was told you had sold it."
"I pawned it. For my fare to Canada. But I was back in three mounts. One of my lanes turned up trumps. I got a man to finance me over here — he's my senior partner now— and we never looked back. I returned to Canada for our firm for four years — came home for good last summer. I warehoused it while I was awaw, "Webber was becoming wenial. "You've done pretty well, too,

"Webber, I did not come here to indulge in small talk. I came to ask certain questions. If you fiel inclined to answer them, I will not inflict my society on you for any looger than is necessary."

"I'll answer any questions you like." Webber's tone was indifferent.
"But I'm damn well not going to play up to that stagey stuff. Fourteen d up to that stagey stuff. Fourteen s years ago! If we have to talk about it, we needn't turn on the slow music. Have a drink?"

"No thanks."

"Then you'll have some coffee to be show that we both intend to behave ourselves. I've just cooked it."

As ever, he was glib and effective and as stupidly bandsome as be had been at twenty-five.

been at twenty-five.

"Very well. Thanks." There was the coffee layout on the writing table.

"The Adwinders set!" he exclaimed

"Yes. But I'm afraid there are only two cups left and I keep the other in the cabinet."

Webber rose to freth the other cup. The set had been one of the wedding presents from her father, who bad designed it humself for Abbumden's. The pot was unact and the milk jug and the sugar bowl. He bad never easily liked that set. It was futuristic—a rower motif with a castellisted top, broad and beavy and inapprotop, broad and beavy and inapproist priate. The metal lid of the milk jug would pop up on its counterpoise like al. a jack-in-the-box, Isobel had been very fond of it, out of affection for her father, so Habershoo had made himself like it too. But he did not like it now. He was almost plessed when Webber babbled:

"By the way, that set isn't as valuable as we all thought. I declared it at a hundred and fifty pounds, but the warehouse people refused to accept it milk?"

"Yes, please."

left clbow

"Yes, please."
Webber poured, the pot in one hand, the milk jug in the other. The familiar action of the lid reminded Habershon vivelly of Isobel, fanning his smouldering hatred of Webber. Webber was facing him across the writing table, leaning forward on his

"As you want to talk about things, Flabershoo, perhaps you'll let me begun. Your making her talke her furniture was a mistake. It kept reminding her that she had walked out on you—with the result that she very soon walked out on me—which was had for all three of us."

"Bad for you, Wehher? When she left you and took that fas by herself!

Before you answer, let me tell you that she wrote to me only once. Whale she was in that flat. Saying, among other things not complimentary to you, that she was ending you money. I have brought the letter with me.

Here it ii." He stretched over the table and put it within the other's reach. "You may read it."

"It's of no interest." Webber made no move to pick up the letter. "Ill take anything from you, Habershon.

You can make out a case that I injured you by seducing your wife. The seduction element is wholly mythical, but let it stand. She aid send me money. She said she wanted to pay back some of the money I had given her."

Habershon shrugged. Webber continued:

tinued;
"She had given me the furniture, verbally. I intended to look after it until she asked for it back. I didn't regard it as mine until after she—until after her death. At that time I was darned nearly pengiles—a state you've never experienced. And as it was true she had cleaned me out, and as she wanted to repay, I accepted the offer."

"Koowing that she had no income? Knowing how she was getting the money to pay you? Knowing that she was driven to druss to overcome her.

revulsion?"

The answer came in words which—true or not — may not be spoken of a woman to a man who has loved her.
"Revulsion my foot! You surely didn't imagine that you were the

if first — by dozens!"

If Habershon had acted delibers ately be would have fumbled with the gun and would almost certainly have massed his mark. He drew and fired across the table in a single instinctive missed his mark, the drew and fired across the table in a single instinctive movement.

He felt the sensation of being beside himself—of watching himself, and himself — of watching himself, and with vast approval. He put the revolver back in his pocket, went to the door, turned off the light. He swaggered across the hall, opened the front door. He was about to shut it when the light in the hall offended his mood. He left Webber's home in darkness, banging the door behind him. A moment later he was banging engine, making a din.

He drove to London in a leisurely manner, savoring life for the first time in fourteen years. He was no longer a rabbit — no longer a dried pea and a cold codfish — no Ionger nourishing a purched little soul on its own bitterness.

On his way through London he passed through the West End. The lights welcomed him. In Piccadilly he slowed down. A woman, young and springy, smiled at him as if he were her own age. He stopped and she got in and rold him where to drive. It was after midnight when he left her. The engine had grown cold, sputtered when he used the starter. At the second attempt it started.

"Good lord! I left Isobel's letter on that writing table!"

that writing table!"

Again he stood beside himself, beyond morality and beyond fear. The police would easily track him through that letter. He must go back for it.

If the police were already in the bungalow he would be no worse off. There was not even any particular need to hurry.

As before, he ran the car into the garden, went up to the front door before he realized that he would be unable to open it. Back to the car for a tire lever with which to force an

Before rummaging for the tire lever he sat on the rummag board, uncertain bow and where be would use it. A moonbeam revealed that a window of the sitting-room had been left open for ventilation. He stepped over the flower bed and wriggled through.

His nerve faltered as he groped for the light switch. He wanted to see nothing but Isobel's letter. He stopped groping for the switch and took out his pocket torch. He found the letter at once, snapped off the the letter at once, snapped off the torch. He did not need it in order to reach the window.

With one leg over the sill he hesitated. The torch had shown him not only the letter but a coffee cup. The Ashwinden set. It might not be valuable, but it was an original model and the Ashwinden people probably had a record of it.

Isobel's father—Isobel's suicide

Webber — Isobel's husband. He turned back. He could still manage with the torch.

Curs and sources, two: sugar bowl:

milk jug: he had some difficulty with the coffee por and nearly knocked it over. He ladd the torch on the table while he assembled the items on the tray. He would not be able to manage the tray through the windmy. He carried it out through the front door. This time he shur it entity.

e He set the tray on the floor of the car and drove home. The garage of the yard, with individual lock-ups. No one saw him with the Ashwinden set.

He went to bed, skept better than

He dialled the Yard and asked for he had slept for years, did not wake up until mid-day. The block provided a seven day service. His hreakfast, laid as usual, was cold and uneatable. He would have an early lunch.

"Where's that coffee set?"

"Where's that coffee set?" He had put it on the hall table, h gone to wash and had forgotten it.

He found it on a shelf in the kitchen. The maid had washed it up. If he were to destroy it now, the incident would be impressed in her incident would be impressed in her memory.

Detective Inspector Rason, of the Department of Dead Ends, had never seen a calculating machine in action until one morning nearly a year after the murder of Webber. He had called at a city office about lunch time and found a solitary typist manipulating one in an outer office.

Young women of all classes were apt to discover in Rason the essential qualities of an uncle, and the girl was soon enjoying herself explaining the machine. There was actually only one thing Rason wanted to know about it.

thing Rason wanted to know about it.
"If you were to poke it without understanding it properly, it would sound like a sort of typewriter, probable," is 27.

wouldn't it?"

"You don't poke it at all!" giggled the wirl. "It's quite easy. Try it if you want to."

"Then I'll show you something!"
Rason became conspiratorial. "But

He dialled the Yard and asked for Karslake.

"Rason speaking. Listen a minute, please?" On the machine Rason slowly rapped out three short, three long, three short. "All right," said Karshke. "You've come out without any money. Where are you?"

"Hold that kind thought," elirped

"Hold that kind thought," elsirped Rason, "I'll come along to your room this afternoon, Goo'hye!"

this afternoon. Goo laye!"

Rason turned back to the machine and studied the superscription. Ashwin Comprometers Led. He wrote the name and nearby address in his notebook. Then be called on the Ashwin Company, unscrupulously suggested that he was a potential customer and obtained advertising matter. Karsake flid not return to the Yard until three. Rason had time to turn up the dossiers of the Wehber case which, after a Coroner's verdict of murder hy person or persons unknown, had come

Then occurred one of those pieces of "luck" which often misled him but never surprised him.

In the inventory supplied by the Repository which had stored Webber's furniture while he was in Canada was the item Ashwinden Set (agreed was the item Ashwinden Set (agreed £20).

"Webber case, sir. I've got a line. Only one end of it so far, but it's a line. You thought I was using a typewriter on the telephone this morning I wasn'tl I was using a comptometer. Missed by a movement of Karsiake's jaw, he explained: "It's a sort of typewriter that's very good at arithmetic. Look here! I've got the literature. That'll show you the keyboard. Note the name of the firm. It's going to be important!"

"I'm glid that's important," grunted Karslake. "Webber used a

And so what?"

Rason smiled indulgently.

"Here—is the inventory of Webber's bungslow which your staff took. No mention of a comprometer! Here—is the inventory of goods stored while Webber was in Canada. That

"Ashwio DEN set!" shouted Karslake, "AshWIN comptometer!" "Ford car — FordSON tractor!"

"Ford car — FordSON tractor!" returned Rason, "It's probably a fancy model."

"It's a comptometer, is it? Then why do they list it under 'chima?" said Karslake. "You run along and consult your niece, She'll tell you that 'Ashwinden set' means a set of china made by a world famous Pottery. Ask that tek-phone girl whether what sheard was not a machine but some-body tapping with a teacup. Better aske a box of choodlates with you."

Rason picked up his papers and departed. Karslake, he thought, was a good mao, but he always took a narrow view. After all, there might be lots of firms called Fordson of whom Henry Ford hud never heard. Perhaps Mr. Ashwin had never heard of the Ashwinden Potteries. And anybody is might list anything under the wrong heading.

He decided to call on the Repository people.

His official card took him straight to the managing director, who passed to the managing director, who passed him to the assessments department with instructions that he was to be given the utmost assistance. The correspondence with Webber was turoed up.

"It all comes back to me now," said the head of the department, "Webber declared the value at a hundred and fifty pounds. We communicated with the Pottery—" t "It was tencups, then?" asked Rason, crestfallen.

"A coffee set. They told us the model had been scrapped and never put into production. As such, it might have a collector's value but not a very high one — they put it at twenty to fifty pounds."

So that, decided Rason, was that The comptometer was definitely out of it. Back to the typewriter. Over a cup of tea, he reminded himself that Kenthla had cound heavilly. With A Kenthla had cound heavilly.

cup of tea, he reminded himself that Karslake had scored heavily. With a muddled idea of salvaging his day's work, he alarmed the waitress by tapping the cup on the saucer in a vain attempt to produce a noise like a typewiter.

while he was tidying his desk, replacing the invoices in the Webber dossier, it occurred to him that the real coffee set had, in one way, taken ter.

tory's inventory and not in the police inventored Webber might have sold it in the interval. But Webber had no need to share in the business, and no de-

Rason decided to have a chat with the woman who had cleaned Webber's day except Sundays," she told Rason. "He took his other meals in London, mid-day." Pressed as to his coffee habits: "I never had nothing to do with that except buy the coffee for him. He made it himself - used to wash up too, making a rare mess on my sink. I suppose he thought I'd be sure to have an accident with his precious china, which I wouldn't have, knowing he kept it in that cabinet in the sitting-room."

"I used to do his breakfast every

"You told the police you thought there was nothing missing from the bungalow. Did you see his precious china he made all that fuss about when they let you go in on the

"Well. I didn't actually see it, not with my own eyes, since you're that particular. But I did see that he'd opened a new packet of coffee which I'd left for him on the Saturday morning. So I nach'rally thought be must have had his coffee as usual before he met his fate, poor gentle-

"Was the sink in a rare mess when you saw it on the Monday moming?" "Come to think of it - no, it wasn't. I expect the local police washed up, knowing I'd be out of my mind with all that botheration." So Webber had not sold the set, nor otherwise disposed of it. Yet it had been missing. On the way back, Rason tried to work it out.

The murderer turns up with a gun and a portable typewriter, which he takes out of its case. He means to kill Webber and ninch his coffee set. He plugs Webber, thinks he's killed him outright. He grabs the coffee set but forgets the typewriter. Webber taps out his S.O.S. on the typewriter. Before morning the murderer goes back for his typewriter - or it might after all be his comptometer - pucks it in its case. If he hasn't taken the coffee set on the first trip he takes it now. That would mean two hands employed, hindering his second getaway.

Rason was stimulated by his own nonsense. Whenever the facts proved that a desperate man was behaving like an imbecile child, it meant that one of the facts had slipped in upside down.

What was the upside-down of wanting a coffee set? You couldn't say "not wanting it." You had to say

"wanting it not to exist." The next day he called at the Ashwinden Potteries. "That set was designed for us by a man named Thane. He made a great many successful designs, but that one, I regret to say, was one of his few failures. The firm allowed him to buy had become a mere mannerism. He it for a nominal sum. Here are the was growing olumn. The service it for a nominal sum. Here are the photographs and specification." "Very novel! Sort of Windsor Castle effect!" said Rason, meaning Thane's address?"

"He's dead. His widow draws a pension from the firm. I could give you her address." Rason called on Isobel Habershon's mother and heard the tragic story of the girl's life and death. It was evening before he made contact with Detective Inspector Karslake. "You were right, sir. Only it was coffee, not tea. I'm talking about the Webber case. I've got it all nicely buttoned up. If you're tired, I'll see to the arrest myself."

"I wasn't tired, but I am now."

Karslake demanded details. He listened with growing interest, nearly lapsed into an expression of approval.

301 you make made as aftern it? I hadn't stopped you! And what would you use instead of evidence." As Ronon looking thin, Karshke continued. "If he took that coffee set to worker, without the control of worker, without the control of providers without the control of worker, without the Dyon think he's keeping it in the Arming more achieve tool you have time to call for it? Your next step. Roson, is to get Habershorn's fingerpross. If they correspond, we'll talk to him. Here, I'd better come with to him. Here, I'd better come with to him. Here, I'd better come with 100 per land to the control of 100 per land to the control of 100 per land to 100 per land to you."

In a year Habershon himself had changed a good deal. The hesitancy was growing plump. The service maid returned his occasional greeting with increasing wintriness, due to her discovery of lipstick and even more definite evidence of a way of living of which she disapproved. In the weeks that had followed the

in the weeks that mad donowed the inquest his reborn courage enabled him to take stock of his position. He made a night trup to Holland for the purpose of dropping his revolver into the North Sea. When that had been accomplished he reckoned that he could deal with any questions that might be abec.

He was entertaining a fair friend in the drawing room when Rason and Karslake called. While he was taking them into the dining room, he had to make a definite effort of memory to marshal the items of his defense. "I think, Mr. Habershon," began Rason, "that you knew Francis

"Well — er — yes. That is, I saw a lot of him at one time."

"When did you last see him?"

"Men did you last see him?"
"At his bungslow, round abou eight o'clock on the night he wa murdered."

He had worked out that answer ten months ago. It was the opening gambit of Plan A, which dealt with routine inquiries. He saw the detectives exchange puzzled glances—which was in line with the plan. He continued:

was in line with the plan. He continued:
"I did not come forward at the time as I could contribute nothing. know that a good many years ago he said Karslake severely. "We found

"I'm very sorry. I was in his sittingroom for about five minutes. The prints are probably mine."

"Very probably!" agreed Rason. Karslake, though senior, produced the print-frame from his bag and instructed the excessively willing While Karslake was comparing those taken in the bungalow, Rason

"When you went into Webber's sitting-room, did you notice any

That told Habershon that they set. Plan A of the defense assumed The question brought Plan B into action - which was several points

furniture in the sitting-room and in the hall - I daresay throughout the bungalow - had belonged to my wife and was part of our home. It was indirectly on that account that I went to the bungalow. Please let me

'I lost touch with Webber some fourteen - fifteen - years ago." must not make another slip over ada. My wife was dead and that un happy chapter in my life was closed. In February last year Webber and I met in the City by chance. We recognized each other but did not

"On April 5th when I returned garage here for me. He must have been waiting for hours. He told me that be still had my wife's furniture and felt that he must return it to me if I would accept it. We were both civil, but not cordial, I said I dad not want the furniture, but would like to have a certain coffee set which designed by her father, who had

"Oh!" At this wholesale admission

"Webber, of course, agreed. I said I would not give him the trouble of packing it, but would collect it my-then. We arrived about eight." "What's become of that coffee set?"

"Nothing. I bave it in a cabinet in the drawing-room, I'll get it, if you'd Habershon went out, leaving the door open. Karslake spoke in an grand total of nix! D'you remember your little piece about you making the arrest if I was too tired to help?" From the hall came Habershon's voice, speaking to the fair friend, "No, no! There's no need to go,

When they've inspected this set, we shall have finished." Habershon put the set on the dining table. The coffee pot and the milk iug, looking like fragments of Windsor Castle: the sugar bowl: two sur-

Rason sat down in front of it, took out the photograph and specification, to check. While doing so, he started "You were commissioned in the Infantry in 1915, Mr. Habershon. Have you still got your revolver?" "No er - no!" Habershon was disconcerted. The revolver had not figured even in Plan B. "I missed it years ago. I suppose it was stolen."

Karslake had winced at the onestion. Rason, instead of following it up. was fooling with the coffee pot and a tape measure. Karslake cut in with his own question. "When you were in the sittingroom, was there a typewriter on the table or a comptometer?" "I don't remember noticing one." Plan B covered that question. "I read in the papers of something of the kind being used to send a signal in tion," Rason had produced another photograph from his dispatch case.

"Take a look at that, Mr. Haber-Habershon took the photograph, mounted on a millboard. He caught his breath and nearly dropped it. It was a photograph of Webber taken after death, emphasizine the "death position eniema. "I confess I find that somewhat - er - nauseating!" said Habershon. "Then keep your eye on the diagram at the side," snapped Rason

"Note that dotted line down from the dead man's arm to the table. That arm was standing nine and a half inches above the table in midair. Got that? Your coffee por is exactly nine and a half inches high! You collected that set some hours after you'd shot him. Habershon."

"Shut up! Anything you say will be used in evidence against you. Not that it matters what you say now Here's the set-up!

Rason leaned over the dining table, his left hand near his ear, as if holding a telephone receiver. His right arm was partly extended, the forearm resting on the castellated roof of the coffee pot.

"Thumb seven and a half inches above the table. If you measure this, Mr. Karslake, you'll find it's okay." He turned his right thumb down till the tip rested on the knob on the lid of the milk jug. Half of the metal Morse, but I can't offer any suggeslid sprang up on its counterpoise like a jack-in-the-box.

Rason stabbed with his thumb. Three short - three long - three short,

LE CHÂTEAU DE L'ARSENIC by GEORGES SIMENON

He hesitated a moment. Then he stood on tiptoe and rang the bell. He was a small man, and the bell was situated in an abnormally high position. The Little Doctor knew that he was being watched - not only from inside the château but from the houses in the village, where they must be wondering who, at such a time, would dare to ring this bell,

He was in a village in a clearing in the forest of Orléans, but the clearing was rather small for the château and the few surrounding cottages. The forest seemed to overflow, stifling the village, and you felt that the sun had difficulty in setting through the thick branches. A lew thatched roofs. a grocer's shop, an inn - all low, narrow houses - and then the château, too large, too old, falling to ruin and looking like an impoverished aristo-

On the first floor a curtain moved, A pale face appeared for a moment at one of the windows.

She was a girl of about twenty to twenty-five, pleasant-looking, prettier than you would have expected to find in such a place. "What do you want?" she asked

"I want a word with Monsieur Mordaur."

"Have you an appointment?" she asked.

"Are you from the Public Prosecu-

"No, but if you would be good enough to give him my card . . . She went away. A little later she came back with another servant, a woman of about fifty with a forbidding face.

"What do you want with Monsieur Mordaut?"

of ever passing this closely guarded gate, spoke frankly. "I have come about the poisonings," he said, with the same charming smile he would have used to give someone a box of chocolates. The face had reappeared behind the first-floor window. Prob-

"Come in, please," he said, "Is that your car? You had better drive it in too, or the children will soon be tenor of the château, was sad and dusty. So also was Monsieur Mordaut with his sunken cheeks covered by a lichen-like, short, dirty gray beard. tle Doctor. "I must apologize for havularly as you have probably never so out of the bottle before you. Did you much as heard of my name." come by the village?" "No. I haven't," said Monsieur "I stopped at the inn for a minute

Mordaut with a shake of his head. "Well, sir, as others are interested in handwriting or palmistry, I have a passion for human problems - for the puzzles which, in their early stages, are nearly always crimes."

"Pray continue."

"I have been extremely interested rent for some time about you and this château. I came here to discover the truth: that is to say, to find out whether you murdered your aunt Emilie Duplantes; then your wife, who was Félicie Maloir before you married her; and lastly your niece, Solance Duplantet." It was the first time that the Little Doctor had addressed such a speech to another human being, and his nervousness was aggravated by the fact that he was cut off from the world by a long corridor, with innumerable doors leading off it, Monsieur Mordaut had not stirred. At the end of a long piece of black cord he swung an old-fashioned eyeglass; his expression was infinitely sad.

"You were right to speak frankly. ... Will you have something to drink?"

In spite of himself the Little Doctor shivered. It is somewhat disconcerting to be offered a drink by a man you don't know, and whom, in a slightly indelicate fashion, you have just accused of being a poisoner.

"Please don't be afraid. I'll drink He spoke slowly, in a tired voice, fixing his eyes on the worn carnet

. . . Monsieur . . .' "lean Dollent." "I would be honored, Monsieur

"That was unnecessary, Monsieur

Dollent, if you would stay here."

Monsieur Mordaut uncorked a dusty bottle of an unusual shape. Almost without tlunking, the Little Doctor drank one of the best wines be

"You must stay here as long as you please. You must have your meals with us. You shall have the run of the château, and I will answer all your questions to the best of my ability. Excuse me a moment."

He pulled a long woollen cord, and somewhere in the building a reedy bell sounded. Then the old servant who had opened the door to Dollent ap-"Ernestine, please lay another place at table. Also prepare the green room for monsieur. He is to be treated here as if it were his own house, and you must answer any questions he puts to you." Once more alone with Dollent, he sighed. "You are probably surprised by this reception. But there are, Monsieur Dollent, moments when one jumps at no matter what chance of salvation. If a fortune-teller, a fakir or a dervish offered to belo me. I would treat him in the same way."

while, with exaggerated care, he wiped the lens of the eyeglass which he never used.

"I am a man who has been pursued from birth by ill luck. If there were connections of Bad luck, champion-from birth by ill luck. If there were competitions of bad luck, championships for bad luck, I would be certain to win. I was born to attract unhapnings, not solve to approach by the all piness, not only to myself, but to all those around me.

"My grandparents were extremely inch. My grandfabre Mordaut built a large part of the Haussmann area in Peris and was worth millions. The day I was born he hanged himself because of some political scandal in which he was involved. As a result of the shock, my mother developed purposed rever and died within time days. My losses — but of his whole fortune only this château remained. I came here when I was five. Playing in the tower I accidentally set fire to a whole wing, which was destroyed, and with it many objects of value."

This was becoming too much. It was almost comical.

"I could continue the list of my misfortunes indefinitely."

"Excuse me," interposed the Little Doctor, "but it seems to me that up to now those misfortunes seem to have fallen more on others than on your-

"Ahl Don't you think that it is just that which is the greatest misfortune? Eight years ago my aunt Duplantet, accently widowed, came to live with us, and six mouths later she was dead of a heart attack."

"They say that she had been slowly possoned by assenic. Hadn't she taken out a life insurance policy in your favor, and didn't you come into a considerable sum of money through her?"

"A hundred thousand france—scarcely enough to restore the south rower which was complied as the south rower was the south rower which was complied to the south rower was the south rower which was considered the south rower was the south rower was the south rower was the south rower which was not rower was the south rower was t

Three years later my wife . . ."
"Died in her turn, and again of a heart attack. She also had taken out a policy which brought you . . .?"

policy which brought you . . .?"

"Which brought me the accusations you know of, and a sum of two hundred thousand francs."

"Finally," sad the Little Doctor,
"a fortnight ago, your nicee Solange Duplanter, an orphan, died here, at the age of twenty-eight, of a heart attack, leaving you the Duplanter fortune, which is nearly half a million francs."

"But in property and land—not cash," corrected the strange man. "This time tongues were really loosened, anonymous letters poured into the Préfecture, and an official investigation was set un foot."

"The police have already been three times and found nothing. On two other occasions I was called to Orléans for questioning. I think I would be lynched if I dared appear in

"Because traces of arsenic were found in the three corpses."

"It seems they always find some.
"You have a son?" asked the Little

Doctor rather abruptly.

"Hector, yes, You must have heard of him. As the result of an illness in childhood, the growth of his brain was arrested. He lives here in the castle. At twenty two he has the body of a man and the intelligence of a child of nine. But still, he's harm-

"The person who showed me in, Ernestine, has she been here a long "Always. She was the daughter of my father's gardener. Her parents died and she stayed on."

"Never." "And the young woman?"

"Rose," said Monsieur Mordaut with a slight smile, "is Emestine's niece. For nearly ten years now she has worked here as a maid. When she first came she was a schoolgirl of six-

"Have you any other servants?" "None. I am not rich enough to live in great style. I live among my books and my works of art. Incidentally, Ergestine hasn't got cancer," said Monsieur Mordaut, "but she talks of nothing else. Since her sister, Rose's mother, died of cancer, she has an unshakable behef that she has also got it. At one moment it's in her back, another in her chest, another in her stomach. She spends half her time consulting doctors, and she's furious that they can't find anything. If she con-But a funous Ernestine now an-didn't he? But he swears his heart is had. Well, I'm certain that it's noth-"Well, are you going to have any heart. There's nothing wrong with Little Doctor and said sadly: each dish and drink out of each bottle before you touch them. It no longer means anything to me. You should with my heart. For the list three months I have felt the same symptoms that my aunt, my wife and my niece all complained of at the beginning of their illnesses."

tite to eat that meal. The Dictor better to eat and sleep at the inn. Hector are gluttonously, like a bodly brought-up child. It was alarming to watch this large youth with the face noon, Doctor3" asked Monsieur Mordaut, "Can I he of any help?" "I would really like to be free to come and go as I please. I'll look round the grounds. Perhaps I'll ask the servants one or two questions." And that is where he started. He moved off towards the kitchen where Ernestine was washing the dishes, "What's he been telling you?" she distrust of the peasant. "Did he tell you about my cancer?" "Ah. He told you it wasn't true, She talked on without stopping her work, and one was conscious of her health and strength. She must once have been a lovely girl, buxom as her health and strength. She must once have been a lovely girl, buxom as hes niece. "I wanted to ask you, Doctor. Can cancer be given to people by arsenic or other poisons?" He didn't want to say yes or no, because it seemed more profitable to play on the old servant's fears. "What do you feel?" he replied,

"What do you feel?" he replied.

"Pains. As if something was being driven into me. Mostly in the bottom of my bock, but sometimes also in my stomach."

He mustn't smile. It would make

He mustn't smile. It would make him an enemy. "I'll examine you, if you like."

"As soon as I've finished the washing up," she replied with alacrity.

quarter of an hour, and each time the Little Doctor showed signs of abandoning it, Ernestine called him firmly to order.

"You haven't taken my bloodpressure."

"What was it last time?"
"Minimum 9, maximum 14 on the Pachot apparatus."

"Well, well!" laughed the Little Doctor. "I see you know your medical

"Indeed I do," she retorted. "You can't buy health, and I want to live to be a hundred and two like my grandmother."
"Have you read any medical

"Gracious, yes. I had some sent from Paris only a month ago." "I suppose your books mention "Of course, and I won't conceal the fact that I've read every word about them. When there have been three them. When there have been three cases under your nose, you learn to look out. Especially when you're in a similar position.

"What did they find when Madame Duplantet died?" she went on. "That she had taken out a life insurance in favor of monsieur. And when his wife died? Another insurance. Well,

"And the money goes to your niece, I suppose?"

"No. To Monsieur Mordaut. And it's no small matter. A hundred thou-

"Your master insured your life fe a hundred thousand francs! Whe

"At least fifteen years ago. A long time before Madame Duplanter's death, so I thought nothing of it at the time."

It was before Madame Duplanter's death. This fact was immediately catalogued in a corner of the Little Doc-le "Has your master always lived in al such a secluded way? Hasn't he ever had any love affairs?"

e "Er . . . your niece Rose is young and pretty. Do you think . . ." She looked him straight in the eye I before replying. "Rose would never allow it." She had been dressed for some time, and had again become the stern old cook. She seemed comforted. Her whole expression proclaimed: "Now you know as much as I do. It was my district to all the stern of the seemed to be seen to be seen as I do. It was my district to all the seemed."

It was a strange bone. Built to house a least twenty people, with an endless succession of rome, corifora and unexpected statenase and corners, it sow whether only four in labitatus. And these four people, in-stated of living color toughter as would have been expected —if only to give themselves the illusion of company—seemed to have used an extraordinary amount of ingenuity in idealizing themselves as much as possible. Emerticle's row must on the second wing.

The Little Doctor went in search of

He had just made a rapid calculation. Rose had been in the house for about a year when Madame Duplantet had died from arsenic—oo from a weak heart. Could one conceive of a poisoner sixteen or seventeen years old?

He listened at the door of Rose's room, heard no sound and softly turned the handle. "Well, come on in," she said impatiently. Twe work to do."

It was obvious that she had expected him to come. She had prepared his reception. The room had been titiled and some papers had been burned in the fireplace.

"Monsieur Mordaut gave me permission to question everyone in the house. Do you mind?" "Go ahead. I know already what

"Go alicad. I know already what you're going to ask me. My aunt told you I was Monsieur Mordaut's mitress, didn't she? The poor thing thinks of nothing else; that's because she's never been married or had a sweetheart."

The Little Doctor looked at the ashes in the fireplace and asked more slowly, "Haven't you a lover or a slowly, "Haven't you a lover or a fiancé?" "Wouldn't that be natural at my

"Can I know his name?"
"If you can find it out. . . . Since must go downstairs, because it's my day to polish the brass. Are you staying here?"

"Yes, I'll stay here if you don't object."

She was annoved, but the went out and he heard her going down the stairs. She probably didn't know that it is postible to read the writing on burned paper. She hadn't bothered to disperse the atless, and there was an envelope which, being of thicker paper, had remained almost insteet. At one conner the word "restatate" could be made out, which led him to suppose that Rose fetched her mail from the

be made out, which led him to suppose that Rose fetched her mail from the village post office. On the other side the sender had written his address, of which the words "Colonial Infantry Regiment" and, lower down, "Poory Coast" could be decinhered.

It was almost certain

at present stationed with his regiment in the tropics.

"I'm afraid I'm disturbing you once

"I'm afraid I'm disturbing you once more, Monsieur Mordaut. You told me this morning that you felt paiss from time to time. As a doctor I should like to make sure, above all, that there's no question of slow poisoning." Without protest and with the trace of a bitter smile the master began to undress.

"For a long time," he sighed, "I have been expecting to suffer the same fate as my wife and aunt. When I saw Solange Duplantet die in her turn . . ."

The consultation lasted half an hour, and the Little Doctor became more and more serious.

"I wouldn't like to say anything definite, until I had consulted some colleague with more experience. Nevertheless, the discomfort you have been feeling could be caused by been feeling could be caused by arsenical poisoning."

"I told you so." He was neither indignant nor even afraid.

"One more question. Why did you issure Ernestine's life?"
"Did she tell you about it? Well, it's quite simple. One day, an insurance salesman called. He was a clever young man with a persuasive manner. He pointed out that there were several of us in the house and all of us getting on in years. . . ," "I know exactly the arguments he shouldn't it at least help you to restore the castle? If all your family died . . . But, excuse me," the Little Doctor interrupted himself. "Is Hector insured too?"

"The company won't insure mental deficients. Anyhow, I allowed myself to be persuaded, and I insured Ernestine in soite of her wonderful health."

"Another question. Did you insure yourself?"

This idea resemed to strike him for yourself?"

This idea seemed to strike him for the first time.
"No." he said in a reflective voice.

Should one treat him as an inhuman monster, or just pity him? Or should one read the greatest cunning into everything he said? Why had he so willingly given the Little Doctor a free hand? Wouldn't a man who was capable of poisoning his wife and two other women also be capable to availlowing rosion himself, but in insufficient quantities to do any real harm?

The Little Doctor, overcome by a kind of dagust which his curiosity only just succeeded in dominating, wandered round the château and the grounds. He was standing by the sate.

wondering if a stroll to the village, wouldn't be a good thing—if only for a change of atmosphere—when sounds of confusion reached him, followed by a loud cry from Emestine.

followed by a loud cry from Ernestine.

He ran round a corner of the château.

Not far from the kitchen was an old barn containing some straw and milking utensils. Inside this huilding Hector lay dead, his eyes glassy, his Doctor did not even have to bend down to diarnose. .

"A large dose of arsenic,"

Near the corpse, stretched out on the straw, lay a bottle with the in-

Monsieur Mordaut turned slowly away, a strange light in his eyes. Emestine was crying, while Rose, standing a little on one side, kept her

Half an hour later, while they were waiting for the police who had been summoned by telephone, the Little Doctor, his hrow covered in a cold sweat, was wondering whether he

He had just elucidated, in part at least, the story of the bottle of rum. "Don't you remember the conversation I had with Monseur Mor-

"You were there. He asked me what there was for dinner and I said 'A vegetable soup and a cauliflower." She was quite right. The Little Doctor remembered vaguely having

"Monsieur Mordaut replied that as you were staying here it wasn't enough, and asked me to make a rum

"When you need rum," asked Dollent, "where do you get it from?" "The cupboard in the dining room, where all the spirits are kept. "Have you a key?"

"Yes, to Monsieur Mordaut."

"What did you do with the rum?" "Put it on the kitchen manteloiece while I cleaned the vegetables."

"Did anyone come into the

"No." "Did you leave the kitchen?" "Only for a few minutes to feed the

"Was Hector in the habit of stealine drinks?"

'It has been known to happen. Not only drinks. He was terribly greedy: he stole anything he could lay his hands on, and went off, like a puppy, What would have happened if

Hector hadn't found the bottle of arsenic and supposed it to contain

Ernestine would have prepared the terness have been out down to the rum? Who would have managed not to eat the omelette - an omelette made in the kitchen, served by Rose. the Little Doctor in the dining room?

There was no dinner at the château that evening. The police were in pos-the gate had difficulty in restraining the crowd, which was becoming noisy. In the dilapidated drawing-room Moosicur Mordaut, white and hagsard, tried to understand the queshe preferred to finish with it all. But, as he was unbalanced and not like tions which were flung at him by the police. When the door opened after the interview, he was handcuffed. He was led into an adjacent room to remain in custody of two policemen.

How often had Dollent said to himself: 'A solid fact, even one, and then, if you're not sidetracked, if you don't lose the thread, you must automatically arrive at the truth,"

Solid facts, They were: 1. Monsieur Mordaut had placed nn obstacle in the way of the Little Doctor's investigation and had insisted on his staying at the château. 2. Expestine was strong and healthy.

She counted on living to be a hundred and two like her grandinother, and everything she did was with this single aim in view; and she was haunted by the idea of cancer. 2. Ernestine said that her niece was not Monsicur Mordaut's mistress. 4. Rose was healthy, too, and had a s. Rose also said that she was not Minisieur Mordaut's mistress. 6. Monsieur Mordaut showed all the symptoms of the beginnings of slaw arsenical poisoning 7. Like the three dead women. Ernestine had a life insurance which would be paid to her master.

"Would you like to know what I really think?" It was Emestine's turn

"Well, my idea is that my master has gone slightly mad . . . and when

"If poor Monsieur Hector hadn't drunk that rum, we should all be dead by now, including the Doctor."

This thought gave Dollent shivers

"Monsieur," he murmured to the Police Superintendent, moving towards the door, "I'd like to have a word with you in private." They spoke in the corridor, which was as gloomy as everywhere else in the house "I suppose - I hope that you have the necessary powers," the Little Doctor concluded. "There is still time . . . if you send an officer by His work was over. The mystery was solved, and as usual, it had been in a single flash, Diverse facts, little then, suddenly . . .

The only way in which the Superintendent and the Little Doctor had managed to escape public currosity was to take the hanqueting chamber on the first floor of the little

After an omelette, made ant with rum but with fines herbes, they had ordered stewed rabbit, which they were now eating. "Until we hear from the solicitor.

all that I can tell you, Monsieur, is simply hypothesis.

"Well. I was struck by the fact that for everyone else dish'r task one our for himself. If the man is a murcleer, and if his object is to get the money from all those policies, what would he do to conceal his intention? First and foremost taske out a policy for himself, so as to avert suspecion. ... Monskeur Mordaut has no life insurance. For some time he has had no family, For some time also he has been sufferner from the effects of slow previous victims. So I ask, who will inherit on his death? Which is why I a saked you to send an officer to the solicitor. "Follow me closely now," said the Little Doctor. "It would seem that the person who inherits from Monsieur Mordaut must almost in-

aneucal possoning, just like the evitably be the murderer. . . ."

"And the murderer is?"

"A moment. Do you want to know who I think is Monsieur Mordaut's heir? Rose."

"So that ..."

"Not so fast. Let me follow my santasy, if I can use such a word, until your officer returns from the solicitor. I came to the conclusion that at some time, years ago no doubt, Mordaut and Ernestine were lovers. The years went by. He married to restore his foctunes, and Ernestine didn't oppose the match.

"She just killed his wife, slowly, as she had killed the aunt whose death brought in so much money. For she was more than Mordaut's mistress, she was his heir. She knew that one day everything he possessed would come to her. I am sure it was she, and not some insurance agent, who was behind that long series of policies. And she had the splendid idea of making him take one out for her, so that she would appear, when the time came, as a potential victim. "You don't understand all this?

It's because you don't live, as I do, in the country, and you are not familiar with long term schemes. Emestine intends to live a long time. It hardly matters that she wastes twenty or thirty years with Mordaut. Afterwards she'll be free, and rich. She'll have the house of her dreams and live to be as old as her grandmorther.

"That's why she's so frightened of illness. She doen't want to have worked so hard for nothing. But, the furture she is eventually to inherit must be big enough. Emilie Duplantet, Madame Mordaut, Solange their fortunes go to Monaieur Mordaut — and finally to Eracettie.

"What's the risk! No one will sue port her because nodorly thinks she is the beneficiary of all these datath. No one knows that he mude her love draw up a will leaving everything to heir in default of direct heirs. Bek till without any danger to hencell. If any thing happens, he will be shoon to up to prion, to be condemned. She only start worrying the day that the feet that the niece, when she unwillingly brought into the bones, it beginning.

young and pretty, and Mnrdaut . . ."

complice. But still, I wonder if she hadn't guessed what her aunt was up Another bottle was placed on the table, ostensibly for the police officer. But it was the Little Doctor who helped himself first and who, after a gulp, said "Do you know what out me on the right track? It was when Ernesting affirmed her niece's virtue, because to doubt that would be to doubt Mordaut's virtue, and if I became suspicious of this, I might begin to suspect other things. "In fact, we interrupted her in the middle of her work. She only killed Hector by chance in her attempt to get rid of the poison and to incriminate Mordaut. He had ordered the rum omelette for dinner. What better way to throw suspicion on him than to poison the rum? I'm sure that the rum wouldn't in fact have been poured over the omelette - but how easy to say afterwards that it seemed to have a funny smell - and so lead to the rum-bottle being examined!

to be done. And then the pretty home in the country and forty years of life lived according to her dreams." The Little Doctor replenished his glass once more and concluded: "There are still people, especially in the country, who make their plans far ahead. Which is why they need so desperately to live to a great age."

"It's disgusting," interpolated the 'Alas, it's life. His passion for Emestine is transferred to her niece-

Rose has a lover or a figner, but what does it matter to her? Rose has something of her aunt's character. She'll wait a few years. She'll wait for the inheritance her master has promised her. She doesn't have to kill anvone. Did she have any suspicions about these murders? She could ignore them, because, in the end, they fare to her benefit."

"It's been a long business, Messieurs," sighed the police officer who had had no lunch and was now confronted with the remnants of the feast, "Apart from the son," he continued, "all Monsieur Mordaut's property is left to Mademoiselle Rose Saupiquet."

The Little Doctor's eyes shone. "Is there no other will?" asked the There was another, in which everything was left to Mademoiselle Ernestine Saupiquet, but it was altered nearly eight years ago."

"Did Mademoiselle Ernestine

know?" the change was made in

The Little Doctor laughed. "So now do you see it all? Ernestine didn't know about the new will. She was until he had amassed enough money,"

It has often been said that letter-writing is a lost art. Don't you believe it. Your Edutor is fortunate that scattered over these United States is a hand of bloodhound enthusiasts who find time to keep up a criminological Many a bleak morning in the past we have got up on the wrong side of the letter from the creator of the Saint which annihilated the cloom and filled us with everlowingkindress. Leslie Charteris's letters are irresistible, irrepressible, and in the case of the one we now quote, irrefutable. In August of 1947 Ledie wrote:

Dear Ellery:

It is my painful duty to inform you that you are a conscienceless It will always be a matter of greef to use that I solemnly let you make me that, said you, it was somewhat improbable that in spite of the Saint's the apartment And all the time, on the table in front of us in the dining room of the Hotel Algonquin, New York Cuy - Ed.'s Notel, was a copy of EOMM containing "The Case of the Frenchman's Glaver" by Margery Alling. ham, in which the whole plot depends on the fact that the detectives, with far less discouragement, fail to search an apartment. Your copy book is so blotted that you could scarcely clean it up even Wine," That temblor which was recently reported from Southern California was actually Charteris hitting the ceiling, I wish I could send you a picture of myself sneering at you.

Leslie, our face is red, you have us dead to rights, and touché. Chally one up for your side, but definitely. We bow our head . . . But you readers may be wondering how Leslie Charteris's letter pulled us out of the dumos instead of sinking us even deeper. Ah, you don't know Leslie! That saintthis sweathbuckler added one word just one word to his letter.
And that one word was the magic word. Over his signature Leslie wrote:

SALT ON HIS TAIL

by LESLIE CHARTER

own dully gleaming cordovan, resting there for a long cool one to break the baking monotony of the miles of steaming asphalt which had San Francisco as their onal trouble should ever have acquired such a name. He was examining the mirrored reflections of sundry characters draped along the mahogany rim (which still boasted the autograph of a Prince of Wales under a screwed-down glass liplate) and wondering if any of them inhabited the paintless houses outside, when he felt a touch on his arm.

"Would it be worth a drink t'see

the Marvel of the Age, stranger?"

An anticipatory hush seemed to settle gradually on the small dark room. Smoon could see in the mirror that each of the characters who decorated the perimeter of the horseshee stiffened a little as the reedy voice broke the quiet.

The Saint turned to look down into a saddle-tanned seamed face studded with mild blue eyes and topped by thin gray bair. The blue jeans were faded, so was the khaki thirt and the red necktie run through a carven bone class. The look in the blue eyes said that their owner expected an order to get the hell from under foot —or, at beat, the politic brush-off.

marvels in these degenerate times," said The Saint gently, "but one drink sounds fair enough."

"Double?" spoke the oldtimes hopefully.

The barrender halted the bottle in midflight and again The Saint felt a tensing among the habitues along the brass rail.

brass rail.
"Double," Simon agreed; and the bartender relaxed as if a great decision had been reached, and finished pouring the drink

The little man lifted a battered canvas grap and placed it tenderly on the bar. He reached for the drink and lifted it toward his lips. Then he set the drink back on the bar and drew himself up to a dignified five feet five.

"Reggin' your parding, mister—lames Aloysius McDill, an' your servant."

"Stroon Templar, and yours, srr," The Saint aid gravely.

He lifted his own drink and they clinked glasses in sokenn ritual, after which James Aloysus McDill demonstrated just how quickly a double bourbon can slide down a buman throat. Then he opened his shabiby log and took out an oblone box of novingly possible wood.

It was very much like a small sable-model radio. A pair of hroad-faced dials on its upper surface sported impressive indicator-needles.

There was a stirrup handle at either end of the box and a sort of sliding scale on top.

"Nice-lookin' job, ain't she?" the little man appealed to The Saint.
"Mighty pretty," responded The Saint, gazing at it as intelligently as he would have surveyed a cyclotron.

The little man beamed. Fle spoke diffidently to the bartender. "Got a silver dollar, Frank?"

The battender obliged, with the air of one who has done this before, and the other customers duplicated his ennui. Once The Saint succumbed to the pitch for a double, the show was pretty well routined.

J. Aloysius McDill tossed the silver dollar across the room. It landed in the sawdust on the floor with a dull thump.

thomp.

He turned a switch, mude some adjustments, and grasped the landles on the varnished box, which there upon emitted a low hymenopterous hummang, and advanced upon the dollar like a hunter staking slitting pame. As he neared the coin, the humming began to keen up the scale. He should lith like a little should be the said of the box slid up and up until, held directly above the coin, it was the while of a bundow the coin and the wall of the while of the while of a bundow the coin, it was forth the while of a bundow the coin, it was forth the while of a bundow the coin it.

eating into a pine knot.
"Can't fool the Doodlebug," said McDill complacently. "See," — he held the box for The Saint to look at — "it works the same way for any other kind o' metal."

The Saint duly noted the markings etched along the sliding scale on topthe moved the indicator to "Gold" and the Doodlebeg, which had been humming like a happy bee, suddenly whined like an angry mosquito. The Saint jerded back his left wrist with the gold watch on it, and the machine dropped again to a gentle hum.

McDill set it on the bar, and it fell completely silent. "Ain't she a beauty?" the little man

"Lovely," Simon agreed. "Just what you need any time you drop a silver dollar."

"She's good for more than that,"

said McDill, "She'll find the stuff they make dollars out of. That's why she's so beautiful. Takes the guesswork out of prospectin'."

"Ah, yes," Simon said. "Have you tested her in the field yet. Mr.

A rattle of laughter eackled across the har-room. It was as though a whiplash had been hid across the face of "Ask him." drawled one of the audience, "why his diagus ain't located no claims yet, if it's so good." McDill fixed the speaker, his chin "lest ain't happened to look in the right places, that's all," he said stoutly, but there was a quaver in his voice. He turned to Simon. "You've seen her, mister. You've seen what she can do. All I need's a grubstake and a little equipment. If you was, maybe, interested in minin', we c'd be pardners." The Saint saw the general merrihad one of his ready quixotic im-

"Well, Mr. McDill," he said in a loud clear voice, "mining's a little out of my own line, but I have a friend I might be able to interest. I'm certainly impressed by your demonstration. Here's my San Francisco address." He scribbled on a card and handed it to James Aloysius MeDill; then he dug into another pocket. "And here's fifty dollars for a week's option on your gadget." He was aware of glasses being set down all alone the bar, of incredulous eves appraising his well-cut gabardines and evaluating his unimpeachable aura of prosperity and well-being; but it was mostly McDill's reaction that he cared about. The blue eyes in the seamed old face flamed with happiness. They could not resist a single triumphant glance at the hangers on; then the ittle man's band stuck straight out. "Put 'er there, Mr. Templar," he said, with a rine in his voice, "I'll be right here, any time your pardner wants me. Bonanza City Hotel." Simon shook the thin, calloused hand, and beckoned the bartender,

No longer bored, he stepped up with alacrity.

"The same, for Mr. McDill and myself," ordered The Saint, "Double," the Fairmont, high on Nob Hill, for the duration of a sleep and a breakfast, when his telephone asserted itself, for the first time since his

"I've called every day since I out your card," said Larry Phelan, "and I was pretty sure you'd show up within the year. What trouble did you come here to stir up?" "None at all," said The Saint virtuously, "I am on a vacation, and I have taken a vow to right no wrong, rescue no young ladies in distress. nothing in your vow about rescuing old ladies in distress, is there?" "Not so fast," said The Saint, "Whose old lady is in distress?"

"Whose old lady is in distress?"
"My old lady, if you must know."
"Your mother?"

"Your mother."

"This," said The Saint, "is beginning to sound like a Gilbert and Sullivan duet. You can buy me lunch and tell me all about it." Larry Phelan was tall and lean, and he had the face of a college sophomore and the mind of the top-drawer mining engineer that he was. "My mother," he explained gloomily, over ecrevises an vin blane, "is in the situation of any elderly lady with an excess of both time and money. Especially money."

"A rather pleasant situation," commented 'The Saint, chewing, "Is there such a thing as too much money?"

"Some people seem to think so," said Phelan, "Did you ever hear of a guy ealled Melville Rochborne?" Simon shook his head. "It sounds like the sort of phony name that I wouldn't buy any gold mines from."

"He sold mother a gold mine," Phelan said.

"Any gold in it?"

"I defv anyone to find any gold in this particular mine," said Phelan sadly, "It's the old Lucky Nugget. Opened up with a hig whoop-de-do in 1906, beautiful vein of quartz, eighteen dollars to the ton; closed in 1907—no more quartz. No one's made a nickel on it since—even the tailings are worked out. The stock, which is what mother bought, wouldn't even serve for wrapping fish."

"There are laws," suggested The

"There are laws," suggested The Saint, "which take care of folks who misrepresent stocks and bonds to other people."

"That's the trouble," said Phelan.
"This Rochborne is an extremely smart operator. There's nothing on record — including mother's own testimony — to prove he ever claimed there was any gold in the mine."

"Didn't she ask you about it?"
"What would you think? After all," said Phelan bitterly, "I have only two degrees in engineering and one in mining. Why should anyone.

only two degrees are togatering and one in mining. Why should anyone, even my own dear mother, coasult mee on such a topic? Obvioudy, a crystal ball and a turban put my eredentials in the shade. I'll admit," he added, in less vehement tones, "Twe been up to my ears in some very hush-hush stuff lately—uranium sources, if you must know. Top creek."

"Keep your uranium," said The Saint. "I don't like the things they do with it. What is this stuff about with it. What is this stuff about crystal balls?"

"My blessed mother," Phelan said reverently. "has developed an interest in the occult. In this specific case, a soothsayer from the Mystic East." "Tea leaves, eh?" said The Saint. "Lucky numbers and cards and so

"And signs of the Zodiac," supplemented Phelin. "A Swami, no less. The Swami Yogadevi." "Sounds like a new cocktail. Where does he come in?" "The Swami," said Phelan sourly, "is the guy who advised Mom to buy the wretched stock. She's sort of got afraid. I suppose he makes a couple of passes at his crystal and evokes a genie, or something." Simon cleaned up his plate and lighted a cigarette.

"One gathers, Larry, that Mama has been hornswoggled by a couple of pretty smooth operators. I almost think it's a new combination."

"Of course. It must be, Don't you see how it works? Your Swami spots the suckers who have plenty of moola, and gets their confidence with his mumbo jambo. Which isn't illegal if he doesn't claim to predict futures. Your Mr. Rochborne peddles stocks and makes no claim for them. You can't prosecute a man for that, Working together, they're terrific, How much," asked The Saint cently, "did your mother pay for the Lucky Nugget mine?"

"Forty-five thousand smackers," Phelan admitted glumly, The Saint whistled, He proceeded to order coffee and then sank into a lethargy which might or might not have until you tripped into my life," said Simon wryly, "However," he added thoughtfully, "if Comrade Rochborne has forty-five G's of Mamma's, he might have someone else's G's too. I'll keep thinking

"What are you looking stupid about?" inquired Larry Phelan.

He did exactly that, although for two days there was nothing to show for his thinking. But to The Saint a hiatus like that meant nothing. He knew better than anyone that those coups of his which seemed most spontaneous and effortless were usually the ones into which the hardest work had gone; that the machinery of his best huccancering raids was labored and polished as devotedly as any master playwright's plot structure. Even then, there had to be an initial spark of inspiration to start the

When it came, it was nothing that he had even vaguely expected. It took the form of a chunky oblong package, crudely wrapped, which a bellbox delivered to his room.

There was a note enclosed:

Deze Mr. Templer. double whishers an eash in his chips las nise his last releast was send you this here feller an he like you a los same is

The Saint lifted the glass in his right hand.

"may there be double bourbons and unlimited credit, wherever you are." He was happely playing with the contraption when Larry Phelan arrived to pick him up for duner that mucht, and the engineer gazed at him in somewhat condescending puzzlement.

"What the hell are you doing with a Doodlebug, Saint?" he demanded; and Simon was hardly less surprised.

and Simon was hardly less surprised.
"How the hell did you know what "The lunatic fringes of the business were stiff with these things during the depression. I've seen 'em in all sizes and shapes. Trouble is, none of 'em are worth anything."

"What do you mean, not worth anything?" Simon objected, "I'll bet I can pick up a silver dollar at ten

I can pick up a silver dollar at ten feet with this gadget."

Simon produced a silver carrwheel and threw it on the carpet. Grasping the stirrup-handles, he lifted the box, and the same humming sound he had heard in the Bonanza City bar filled

Sumon made sure the scale pointer indicated "salver," and advanced upon the dollar. Just as it had done jor James Aloyisus McDill, the humming keened up the scale until, as The Sunt stood over the dollar, as The Sunt stood over the dollar, an allignant whining came from between this hands. He turned to Phelan eximple or the sum of the sum

"This one works," he said.
"Sure," rejoined Phelan. "No let's see how well it works," directory and piled them on top of the dollar, and the humming stopped abruptly.

"They're all the same," Phelan

"They're all the same," Phelan said sympatrically, "It seems to be possible to bounce some kind of oscillation off different metals, and make it selective according to their atomic structure, but the beam hardly has any penetration. You look would have to be practically on the surface, where you could see it anywhy, before a thing like this would detect it at all.

I hope you didn't pay much for it."
"Only fifty bucks and a couple of drinks, and it was worth that," said
The Saint; and the thought deepened in his blue eyes. "In fact, I think this is just what we needed to square

in his blue eyes. "In fact, I think this is just what we needed to square accounts with Brother Rochborne and your swami."

The Swami Yogadevi had never seen a Doodlebug, but he had his own effective methods of ascertaining the presence of precious metals. His rechniques depended for their success upon certain paraphernalia unknown

ter upon certain parapoteraisa unisionomico de to electronice, such as a large, es spherical chunic of genuine optical glass; celestial charta populated by tild, erabs, bolls, goats, virgins, and other, a mythological creatures; and many yards of expensive diapety embodered with cotorie symbols—the whole enthined in a gloomy and expensive apartment on Russian Hill.

There was nothing about the place to suggest that the Swami Yogadevi had once been Reuben Haggitt, known to the carnival creat as Mi-Pasha, the Mighty Mentalist. Mr. Haggitt's wants had been simple in those days, expected mainly in treas the control of the control of the third way to the control of the when he wished he hadn't not Melvulle Rochborre, profitable though the partnership had turned out to be.

For instance, there was this Professor Tattersall business. "How should I know who's Professor Simoon Tattersall?" he asked with asperity.

Mr. Rochborne eyed the mystic

"I don't expect you to know anyking," he said coldly. "All I want you to do is read it — if you can." The seer pushed his turban back on his foreboad and picked up the newspager chipping again. It was from the front page of the final afternoon edition of a Sun Francisco daily.

CLEMENTINE VALLEY, Calif (by a scall correspondent)— There's a lot of gold still lying around the long abandoned Lucky Nugget Mine near here if someone will just come along with the right kaid of divising rod, water with, or a sensitive nore. Professor Simon Tattersall not only save that the gold is there, but asserts freely that he has the godget that will find it. Said gadget, his own ascention, he modelayly wides the Tattersall Magnetic "Say!" bleated the soothsayer,

"Ain't this Lucky Nugget Mine the one you sold that Phelan dame?"
"It is," said Mr. Rochborne coneisely, "What I want to know now is who this Tattersall is and why he

"It is," said Mr. Rochborne concisely. "What I want to know now is who this Tattersall is and why he picks the Lucky Nugget to demonstrate his screwball gadget, just three weeks after we made a deal with it."

"It says here be thinks there's gold in it," said the Swami brightly. Mr. Rochborne favored him with a look of contempt and got to his feet. He was a large man with hulking shoulders and a tanned kindly face, of the type which inspires instant trust in dogs, children, and old ladies. "One thing I'd bet on — there's no such person as Professor Simeon such person as Professor Simeon Tattersall. There never was a name like that. There couldn't be."

"What're you going to do about it.

"I don't know," said Mr. Rochborne darkly. "Maybe nothing. May be something. But one thing I do know, I'm going to be there when this know, I'm going to be there when this

Professor* — he put quotation marks around the title — "holds his 'demonstration' tomorrow morung."

Simon Templar might have hoped for a more impressive turn-out in response to his carefully planted publicity, but he could also have been guilty of discounting Larry Phelan's estunate of the skeptussm of local wiseacrest in the matter of Docellebugs. The Lucky Nugget mane site on Thurslay morning was fairly uncrowded by seven male and two feClementine Valley, all more or less three cynical reporters, two does, and But to Simon Templar the most built man, conspicuous in city clothes,

The Saint had arraved himself for the occasion in what seemed a likely pith helmet, and riding boots, with the addition of a gray goatee which sat rather strangely on his youthful

He eved the eathering individually and collectively with an equal in-Valley's only taxicab, tenderly bear-

"Good morning, ladies and gentle-"Hey, Prof," queried a high thin voice from the group, "will she bring town laughter, to which Simon professorially paid no heed. tially caved-in tunnel sunk into the bowels of a red-dirt pine-freekled bill. by fallen dirt and broken timbers. "Professor Simpon Tattersall" sapiently eved the tunnel mouth, grasped his device, and took a step toward the "Mind if I look at your gadget, Professor?" said a genial voice man in the city clothes standing at his "Well, sir," said The Saint, in his most precise pedantic voice, "in the first place, this is not a 'gadget'; it is a highly involved and intricate extrapository reactodyne, operating according to an entirely new principle of electronics. Later, perbaps, after may -" "Not afraid I might find something phony, are you?" The big man stepped very close. "And haven't l seen your ricture somewhere before?" Professor Someon Tattersall lowered his eyes for a single fleeting instant, then raised their candid blue gaze to the stranger's. "You may have read about my work in mineral detection -- " "That's what it said in the naner." assented the large man lovially, "I must have been thinking about someone else. The name's on the tip of my tongue -- but you wouldn't know about that," He beamed, "Anyway, Prof. I've been in the mining game a long time. Know all the dodges. Pil be watching your demonstration with great interest."

He chuckled tranquilly and reioined the motley gallery There followed what radio commentators call an "expectant bush." Simon picked up his instrument. started up the slope from the mill to the small mountain of "muck" fanning out helow the old mine-entrance. ence following, and approached the them, he found the big city observer at his elbow.

"Not good." The large man shook steep hillside itself. on the box again and to the obbligato of the resultant humming, began moving along the base of the hill, shifting the device to and fro as he

Alicad of the exploration lay a large slide of loose dirt brought down by once the box's tone slid up an octave. The Saint stopped; he moved the box to the right, away from the hill, and the tone dropped; be swung it toward ly: he moved toward the slide, and the tone mounted until at the base of the fresh clods it was a banshee wail.

small collapsible spade and poked tentatively in the dirt hand and came up with it held high: and between his thumb and fore-

tinger glittered a tiny pea-sized grain

"The Tattersall Prospector never best class-room manner, "I hold in my hand a small nurret of sold. Obviously, somewhere on the hillside above us, we will find the source of this nugget. I predict -"

His words were lost in a vell as the small crowd, like one man, started up the steep bank toward the source of

I'd get the hell out of here before salted this slide." He shook his head again. "I just remembered where I saw your face - and I expected something better from The Saint," he said. "Lasten - you may have been a hot shot in your own league, but you dadn't really expect to take Melville Rochborne into camo, dad you?"

his head, "If I were you, Professor,

"It was always worth trying," said The Saint sheepishly. He poked his snade into the slide and turned over the loose earth. "All right, Mel," he said, "You win this time. Have vourself a shoe-

he spilled a shovelful of durt deliberately over Mr. Rochhorue's shining pointed toes before he threw out for a moment; and then he bent

Suddenly he seemed to stiffen. He crumbled it in his fingers. A strange look came into his face, to an engaging glow while Mrs.

Phelan gushed: "Why, Mr. Roch-

"As a matter of fact, Mrs. Phelan," boy caught in the jam closet, "I'm here on business. I hate to impose on

"Go on, Mr. Rochborne," she fluted. "Do go on. Business as business,

"I might as well come right out with it." Rochborne said wearily. "It's about that Lucky Nugget stock me. I'm not at all sure it's a good investment."

"Oh, dear!" Mrs. Phelan sat down suddenly. "Oh, dear! But - my my forty-five thou-"Now, Mrs. Phelan, don't excite

"Telephone, Mrs. Phelap," A maxl stood in the doorway

"Excuse me," said Mrs. Phelan. "Mrs. Phelan," said a deep melliffluous voice on the wire, "this is Swami Yogadevi." "Oh - oh, Swamil" The old lady sighed with relief. "Oh, I am so glad

"Dear Mrs. Phelan, you are in trouble, I know, I could feel the disturbance in your aura. "Oh, Swami! If you only knew. The stock you said I should buy, re-

"He wants to buy it back from you. "He . . . does . . . ? Oh, then "Sell, Mrs. Phelan. But for a profit.

"But how much should I -- " "Not a penny less than seventy thousand, Mrs. Phelan, No. not a penny less - and only in eash, Mrs is in the ascendant. You will not say that I have talked to you, naturally, Goodbyc." When Mr. Melville Rochborne heard the price, he barely escaped being the first recorded case of human spontaneous combustion. "But Mrs. Phelan . . . I've just told you. The stock is no - well, it's been misrepresented. It's not really worth the price you paid me. I thought if I gave you your money "The stars," said Mrs. Phelan raptly, "control my husiness dealings. I am asking seventy thousand for the

"Oh, sure, the stars." Mr. Rochborne thought rapidly. "May I use your telephone?"

He dialed a certain unlisted number negative results that had rewarded him even before he called at Mrs. Phelan's house. At the end of that time he returned, slightly frantic

"Mrs. Phelan," he said. "We can discuss this, I know. Suppose we say

"Seventy, Mr. Rochborne," said Mrs. Phelan. "Sixty-two fifty," cozened Rochold lady.

Mr. Rochborne thought fleetingly of the mayhem he was going to perform upon the luckless frame of Reuben Haggitt when he caught him.

"Very well," he groaned. "I'll write you a cheek."

"My Swami told me all deals should be in cash," said Mrs. Phelan brightly. "I'll set the stock and go with you to the bank."

An hour later, minus practically his entire bank roll but grimly triumphant, with the stock of the Lucky Nugget mine in his pocket, Mr. Melville Rochborne met Mr. Reuben Haggitt on the doorstep of the apartment house on Russian Hill, and

"You stupid worthless jerk!" he exploded. "What's the idea of being out all day — and on a day like this?

You just cost us twenty-five grand!"
"Listen," shrilled the propliet,
"who's calling who a jerk! What did you do about that mine?"

"I gar it back, of course." Rochborne told him shortwindedly. "Even though the old bag took me for twenty-five G's more than she put into it - just because you wern't around to cool her down. But I ideln't dure take a chance on waiting. There were some oldtime prospectors around, and if any of them recogaround, and if any of them recognized the carnotite —"

"The what?" Haggitt asked,
"Carnotite that's what uranium comes from The Lucky Nugget is full today. If any of those miners spotted it and the story was in the papers tomorrow morning, you couldn't buy that stock for a million dollars. It was The Saint, of course," Mr. Roebborne explained, becoming even more incoherent, "and he was trying to put over the most amateurish job of mine-salting I ever saw; but when he reads about this—"

The Swami was staring at him in a most unspiritual way.

"Just a minute, Mel," he said,
"Are you drunk, or what? First you send me a wire and tell me to meet you at the airport. I watch all the planes come in until my ears are buzzing. Then you send me another wire there about some new buyer for the Lucky Nugger, and tell me to belone the Phelan dame and tell ber to hold out for seventy grand in cold cash —"

A horrible presentiment crawled over Mr. Rochborne

"What are you talking about?" he asked weakly. "I never sent you "I've got 'em right here in my pocket." His colleague's voice was harsh, edged with suspicion.

"Ohmigod," breathed Mr. Melville Rochborne. "He couldn't have salted it twice . . . he couldn't salted it twice...he couldn't have..."

It was Simon Templar's perpetual regret that he was seldom able to overhear these conversations. But berhaps that would have made his life too perfect to be born

Joseph Shearing the rightown is the nather of a server of premanifold round and hand on a relative of human could be related to the media of present and hand to the pulse of human for each that the county of the Shearing shorts — as allumin edilectation — are eitracily sudgeous in America. The one when selected for Mr. Schering'; first appearance in EDMM is the entry of Mary Firey, a wealthy old main of glommaning personality, as women show has adjusted the officers to the point of adhiggaring as a scene passion. You may marred at how a man could have estamed as a scene passion. For many the resultance of the other passion, and the second to desire the married and the second to desire the second

LOVE-IN-A-MIST

by JOSEPH SHEARING

Many saves made three entries in the recommonplace book: Hen, to speak to digaths about he high heels. Hem; to have the old bridge in Coom Wood reputed. Hem; to replect the bests below the terrace anth Queen Anne's Lare and Nigella (Loov-in-a-Miss).

None of these things was of much importance, but Miss Fryei was a very underkeeper methodical woman and it worried her with when some trifle slipped from her Then, this keen memory only to re-occur at neath the Copraght, 1912. In Journal Shearons some inopportune moment. When she had had been in Croom Wood she had noticed that the wooden bridge across the steep water-break and rapid stream was rotting and, in fact, quite dangerous. But as it was very selfoon used — Croom Wood was the loneliest part of the estate — she had forgotten about it until John Ports, the underkeener, had remades her of it

Then, the flowers - that bed beneath the terrace - required, she thought, a blue color against the stone. dence put in year after year.

Agatha was one of the housemaids, and Mess Fryer, who kept many servants, did not often see her; but it was an acute, if occasional, irritation to hear the tap, tap of those high beels along the wide corridors. Miss Fryer had already spoken to the girl, who, however, continued the offense. There must be an end of that annovaoce, buy for her a pair of comfortable flatheeled, wide-toed shoes, summon the girl into her presence, then tell her she must wear them and not the foolish, uncomfortable French shoes which must have cost far more than she could possibly afford. The acute mind of Mary Fryer made a connection between the hridge and the vanity of the housemaid. Agatha was one of the few people who went through Croom Wood, which was a short cut to her grandfather's farm at Lyston, and if she, foolish as she was, tried to cross the bridge instead of going round over the head of the water-break, it was quite feasible that she might catch one of those ridiculous heels in the broken planks and fall onto the stones below. The current was strong, deep, and or see the struggles of Agatha, for the spot was quite forsaken.

"I must warn the girl." Then Mary Fryer smiled. "I suppose that is why Portis reminded me of the hridge." The underkeeper was going to marry Agatha in the wioter. Miss Fryer had taken a great interest in the improving and garnishing of the cotoecupy. And the dressmaker at Lyston was making, at Miss Fryer's expense, a generous outfit for the bride. This was not being done for the sake of the girl, who was treated with great coldness by her mistress and kept at the same distance as all the other servants, but because of Mary Fryer's concern with John Portis.

She shut up her commonplace book and locked it in her desk. A full day's work and leisure was before her, for the autumn morning had just begun. It was a pleasure to her to sit in the on to the well-kept, carefully cherished gardens with park, meadows, and fields beyond - all belonging to Mary Fryer. She was a happy woman. It did not trouble her that she had she was fifty years old and had never been either beautiful or charming. She owned Fryer's Manor, she was in her proper place, part of a satisfying continuity; she relished, with a keen zest, every detail of her life, she enjoved her pride of place, her talent for management, the great respect everyone gave her, the comforts and luxuries she could afford to give berself. She continually rejoiced in her possessions, from the rich Manor itself to the least of her frail Worcester tea cups; she was healthy, strong-minded, and had never known a regret.

Without blenching she contemplated, every time she went to church (and on no resuccible occasion was her impressing pow empty), the gaves of her anextors and the place where she would he bestelf. These dead Feye were all living to her; their portraits were on her walls, their aumes and stories in ther heart and often on her lips. She rather believed that if you were a Percof Feyer Manor, it did not much matter if you were alive or dead.

In the same spirit of placid and generous pride she regarded her heir, a younger sister's son; everything would be his with the one proviso—that he took the name of Fyyer. She carefully altered the date on the calondar — September 18, 1855; September, a delicious month is blocked forward to days and days of delight, to years and years of enjoyment, for the was so strong, healthy, and equable in liter temperament — year has was user that she would reflect to the last manute of it, as she reliable for futher's good port to the last drop the first of the start of the sta on the rongue.

She was in a mellow mood and counted her likessings. How fortunate it was that she had always been able expensions to the state of t sion, for all the qualities of leadership, had not been fully used. A crisis that now—she would really rather like to be faced with a crisis, just to show herself what she could do.

"How abourd I am being As if any, thing like that would happen to me And what a bother if it did! Now, what have I to do this morning! Four letters to write, there visits to make —" She rose and opened the window, allowing the uninterrupted suitable to full over the handome furniture, the net carpets, the spotless silver, and all the other evidences of long established waith and effects of long restablished waith and effects of long restabilished waith and experiences of long restabilished waith and experiences."

decorum.

Mary Free was a short woman with an aquiline nooe and slightly prominent gave eyes; her complexion was very good and she had pretty prominent gave eyes; her complexion was very good and she had pretty bombaine, her lair was the color of bay, very smoothly dressed in a net of back cheenle. Ar her waith hung a multitude of small keys (the large keys she carried in a fast basket) and in her close fustword bodie was her chain, which passed several times chain, which passed several times.

enund her neck.

As she stood there, in the house where she had been born and where she would die, looking over the land that seemed part of herself—as if she had been actually moulded from the warm earth—this little woman thilled to a sens of her own power—
a power over others and, more triumpiant will, nower over herself.

In this matter of love, for instance, size had won a notable victory. In the voust has had coolly decided to marry an man unless be came up to her secrestandard of what her hashand thould a control to the control of the co out of her self-satisfied musing.

"Come in."

It was Agatha who entered. One glance at her showed Miss Fryer that the garl was in the deepest dis-

"What is the matter, Agatha? Come into the room, child, if you please, and sit down."

Miss Pryer closed the window and returned to her seat by the desk. The gri obeyed and took the high, stiff chair with the white and black headembroklery. "A chance to tell her about her heels," thought Miss Fryer, but, as usual, kindly and reasonable, she waited for Agatha to speak. And while she waited looked at the girl with that poignant gaze she turned on her whenever she saw her, which was not often.

Agatha Lerder was eighteen years old with not very good features and a common, silly air. But she had the bright coloring, the starry eyes, the red lips, and the abundant fair hair ness. She was easily excited and could be very pert and rude, but she was also good-natured and gentle. Miss Fryer despised her with an in-

Miss Fryer despised her with an intensity of contempt that often surprised herself.

"Well, Agatba, what is it?" she asked very pleasantly. "You look quite ill. It must be something serious, surely, for you to have disturbed me in the middle of the morning." Agatha did not reply; she sat slack and helpless, twisting the buttons on the cuffs of her lifac-sprigged gown; her face was blotched pink and white and her hazel eyes bulged like the eyes of a rabbit Miss Fryer had once seen caucht in a trao.

And then, suddenly, terror gave a fixity to Miss Fryer's secone gaze. "Not — some accident — with Ports? A sun ——"

d "No, ma'am. He's all right."

"We'll, then," said Miss Fryer

frather sharply, "tell me please, what is the matter. I am busy."

The gul's face puckered up. She

Miss Fryer felt the keenest contempt for her in the world, that of an intelligent woman for a silly one, when it is softened by neither chivalry nor humor.

"Please stop crying, Agatha. If you upset yourself like that you will not be able to tell me anything, and I suppose that you wish me to help you?

Very well, then. Now, you see I am calm. You want to confess somethine?"

"Don't pull like that at your cuffs You have broken something? Spoiled sob Miss Fryer added. "I hope that you haven't stolen anything?"

"It's not as important as that to you, ma'am," whispered Agatha, thing of yours, It's - the twenty-five pounds - that John gave me - his savings." "I see. The savings of John Portis. And he gave them to you, like a fool, to buy some things for your house. And you spent them, these savings, on finery in Hereford, I suppose?" "No. It's worse than that - ma'am."

The fair head sunk lower and lower. the pretty, hor, swollen has stam-

"I gave - it - to Ted - he gam bled it away, market day," "Ted? Who is he? You haven't got a brother, have you? I don't know very much about you, really. Please "Oh. Miss! How am I to make its clear! It's Ted Branston, what used to be the carter here --- " ness. He is a good-for-nothing!" "So they call him - but I ---" "Yes, you? - look at me, Agatha!" The girl, timidly, yet not daring to refuse, raised her tear-sodden face. which outvered with terror at the sight of those pule, prominent ever turned on her with so implacable a

"Oh, ma'am! I'm a wicked, wicked girl! There's no hope for me, that I well know. He had the money out of me afore I knew, his talk so tender and

"Did he have aovthing from you beside the money?" Miss Fryer was movements; her gaze fell to the girl's high, silly heels . . . pretty shoes, pretty feet, though, "I used to meet him in Croom

Wood. He's not a man to respect a girl - like John. He used to frighten me, too, I gave him the money to my for a sailor - I hoped it would never be found out. But it will. I can't go on. 'Stop, please, Agatha, What are you trying to tell me?" "Oh. I haven't the courage to tell

"I think that I understand, even if ing to marry John Portis, but you are going to have Ted Branston's baby,

And now he is asking about the money and perhaps wondering why you aren't well - and you are frightened.

"Stoperying! How am I to help you if you make yourself ill? What do you exactly want?" "The money. I'd work my fingers to the bone to repay --- " "Never mind that. You want twenty-five pounds. What else?"

if you could think of something. I don't know much about it - I'm

You intend to marry him, just the "It 'nd break his heart if he knew."

"He - loves you - so much?" "He's fair set on me. Different from our be'd fair kill me ----"

"And the other mao - this drunken carter - what are your feelings there,

"I don't care for him no more." "I see." Miss Freer continued to play with her watch-chain. "And

"He's a good man," sobbed Agatha. "Be quiet. You'll be heard outside you. I've met so many girls like you. Natural sluts! But John Portis is a good servant, I value him very highly. I intend to promote him. I've been kind to you because of him." "I know, that is why I came to you - because of what you think of John, ma'am." Miss Fryer's hand paused on her fleeting look of cunning on the pretty. easily, Agatha. The money is no more than I intended to give you as a wedding present. And I could think of quite a good excuse to take you away, would be quite safe."

"Oh, Miss! I couldn't ever thank "Don't thank me vet. I don't know if I shall do it. I don't know if it would be right. John Portis is far more important than you are, and I don't know if it would be fair to him. I

Agatha again began to weep and implace. Miss Fryer checked her by rising. And instinctively the servant

"Don't bother me any more. I decision. And it doesn't take me long to make up my mind." "Oh, you wouldn't be cruel, Miss! You are so charitable!"

"No, I don't think so. I'll tell you this evening exactly what I shall do.

Now, control yourself - go upstairs and lie down. I shall tell everyone you have a little chill." "It's my half-day, ma'am, Granny 'ud think it oueer if I didn't turn up.

Agatha, rubbing her face with a large, coarse white handkerchief, turned to leave; Miss Fryer stopped

"Portis -- doesn't suspect?"

"Oh, God! I hope not! But he seemed queer like, yesterday ---- " "Well, leave it to me. And stop crying, you poor little fool." The heavy door closed on Agatha Miss Fryer was alone with the greatest problem of her life. It was this: the woman whom he so passionately loved, or hy revealing to him the trash that she was? The happiness of John Portis was Mary Fryer's sole concern in this business: for the girl concern in this busin she cared not one jot.

But he —he was the man whom she would have loved, if he had been a gentlenan and if he had been he was age. She had known that when he had first come from Ross five years ago and she had employed him on her estate. Recognized the fact with irony, without regret, even with pleasure in the realisation that the world did contain one such man as she had deepend of in her youth.

But - the son of a small farmer and twenty years her junior. She had not betraved berself by a flick of an evelid, not sacrificed her justice, her screnity, her dignity by an iota. The man had not been unduly favored nor rewarded - she was generous with all her servants. She had been glad of his happiness with Agatha; that she regarded tenderly, like a mother watchful and necessary. Nor did her secret passion trouble her content. She often irony; she would not name it love -Mary Fryer could not love a man in her employ - hut she admitted: "If loved him," And looking at her bods of nigella she would think that their country name suited her emotion. Love-in-a-mist! Not clear, warm, radiant, but shining through other worst from the sun and from reasity. But there were oo gracious veils about her passion now as she turned over Agatha's confession in her alert mind. She was astonished at the heat mind. She was astonished at the heat and fury of her protective love for the man, her latter scorn of the gitl. She had felt no yellowy when he had chosen the soft, fondling fiol, but now she regarded with hatred the false, cowardly, selfish, turqud site who had contrived to entangle lolm who had contrived to entangle lolm.

A mist, like that which sets aside the

"A man like that!"

Her pale glance crept to the stiff painted faces of her ancestors in the portraits on the walls, as if she asked advice from their embattled presences. A Fryer ought to know what to do. But for the first time in her life she felt at a loss.

Would be rather be deceived or enlightened?

She knew well enough, from instinct and close, furtive observation, shink and task, untire observation, how he dotted on the wretched creature. Should she, as the so easily could, help the gift to appear what he thought her? Leave him to find out graduilly, when his own passion was spent, what bad fruit he had plucked? Or perhaps never find out at all. Agatha might be frightened into future honesty or she might be cunoing enough to decive him forever.

Or should she, Mary Fryer, tell him the truth, watch him through his rage and grief, and then richly compensate his disappointment?

She did not allow it to interfere with her habits; the sunny day pro corded as usual, leisurely, well-prdered; she had her good meal and drank two glasses of porr instead of one, she wrote her letters and paid her visits in the village. And at the back of her mind the question - "What shall I do?" --As she returned from the village about four o'clock, she saw Agatha in a black-and-white plaid shawl and black straw bonnet leaving the Manor garden by the servants' entrance and walking, heavily, towards Croom "She looks quite calm," thought

Miss Fryer, "I suppose she is trusting my womanly pity. How little she But then Mary Fryer remembered that fleeting look of understanding across the girl's face, as if she had guessed, "But it is impossible. She is a fool. And I haven't given myself away. I never told her about those doubly dangerous in her condition. I suppose, if I tell him, she will drown herself or something of that kind. That wouldn't matter at all."

Miss Fryer went into her parlor and sat down without taking off brown silk shawl and the close little hat with the russet ostrieb tip and veil that fitted so neatly to her close, smooth chignon. She was always very careful of appearances; even this afternoon, in her great absorption, she had selected a pair of fresh kid gloves; she like to see them on her small hands, She felt very restless and full of enerry, ready to undertake any prodigious action for the sake of John Portis. She was much excited to realbold, resolute and daring it made her - but, what to do?

Certainly she could not stay in the house: she would so for another walk away from the village, away from everyone.

She took up her reticule and her noon hush of the house into the sunny loveliness of the park. Mary Fryer turned where there were no horizons - into the woods. She was veering rowards her decision

- not to tell. Her painful and pasevolved this judgment; that he would prefer any furure disaster to that of being cheated of his present felicity. Miss Fryer walked quickly, absorbed in plans for helping Agatha, for preserving intact John Portis's illusion of happiness; her mind worked not notice where she was going until a sound of water disturbed her and she realized that she was in Croom

She was pleased that she had, as it were, come naturally into this solitude where she was not likely to be disturbed. A space of harsh bracken. deep tresses of broken weeds, and long brambles with withered leaves and high pines that quite shut out the unfalling on stones. She could just see the bridge as she ascended the hilly "I must remember those renairs -

I mustn't let this interfere with my Then she stood still, listening, of the tumbling water. Something being dragged - a village child stealing an old, dry bough, perhaps. She stunned by the incessant roar of the water, and walking forward through spade resting against one of the straight, fine trunks.

She concentrated on this for a moment, frowning, wondering, considering; when she looked round suddenly and saw John Portis a few paces dragging along the body of Agatha.

Miss Fryer knew at once the blackand-white check shawl, the black chip straw bonnet. He had not seen her and she could have easily fied, but she never thought of doing so. Her whole which she need no longer concern herself; she felt lifted up, out of

"John Portis."

The man turned, at once alert and

There has been an accident.'

He straightened himself; Agatha, of her shoes had come off. Mary Fryer looked at the young man and smiled; faced by this com-

"I waited for her. She always came this way to Lyston."

"I suspected. When I faced her with it she couldn't deny it. A dirty drah! Begging your pardon, Miss Fryer.'

"I don't mind. It is true. She told me. "I swore last night I'd do it - if it were true. I don't mind swinging."

"Why should you be - punished - for an accident?" "An accident? I ----' down at Agatha. The girl had been strangled; everything was hideous locks that fell out of her crushed "Why did you fetch the spade.

"I ran back for it to the woodman's hut - I was taking her to

"That is all foolish. The bridge is broken and she would wear those her to fall into the stream! No one would enquire further than that --- "

The man's rigid face became full of boht and energy; it was like a mask coming to life. "My God! - I never thought of that!"

"Cover up her eyes, Portis - they

the time she's been dashed from one rock to another ----"

Miss Fryer dropped her clean, fragrant handkerchief and walked ahead without looking back, towards the broken bridge. She heard him busy with his burden, behind; she wondered if his will or her own was animating him. She went on to the bridge and still she did not book at what he was about, but broke away some of the moten wooden railings and kicked some nieces of the powdering planks and cast them down into the powerful "Now they will see that these are fresh marks --- " She looked below and saw the check shawl, black bon-was adroit and powerful. She descended from the frail bridge and picked her way to where he stood dumb on the edge of the swift waterfall, gazing after his victum. He was strong, ruthless, magnificent as the roaring water itself; her pale glance caressed every line and hue of his

"You have disturbed some bracken and boughs. You will be able to put that right? And put that spade back He turned to stare at her and her love was perfected by his complete absence of subserviency.

"Why did you do it, ma'am? I didn't mind taking the penalty, It was because of the flies I was going to bury her -- not to hide it."

"Yes. It seemed an escape - but I

"I do. This ends everything. She won't be disgraced either."

"It seems better like this. The law don't touch a thing like this either, does it, ma'am?" "No. I don't think so."

"You see, she was mine. Do what I liked with. If it were any but that filthy carter - spending my money, too - and here, in this wood - where we used to meet -he and she - again asking your pardon, ma'am." "You needn't, I thought of it too. And wondered, too, I don't understand these women who are just animals." "Why couldn't she like me?" "She was a fool, Portis. We had better go." they reached the path; out of sight of the stream and what the tumbling waters played with. . . . "This is my land, Portis. I have the my employ. I feel that you are mire, to do what I like with." Miss Fryer was rather breathless. "I suppose you would prefer to get away - from Croom Wood? I could find you work with a friend of mine in Dorset." "Thank you, ma'am, that would be better," he replied absently. She touched his corduror sleeve and asked very delicately: "How do you feel, Portis?"

"Numb. As if my heart and all the feeling in it had been cut out of my "It's good - after all the - pain.

other women. I'll look after you, as long as you like."

He peered at her blankly. "Why, ma'am?" fault to find with you," She looked curiously at the strong hands that now hung slackly by his side, but that had, a little while before, crushed the life out of Agatha; and she smiled again. "Goodbye! Do not forget the spade.

Remember to be careful. And you must live - and forget." He touched his forelock mechanihim fetch the spade, return to the path, and disappear up the rising ground; she felt that her will, not his, was doing this.

There was still something for her to do. That other shoe. . . . She searched for it, found it, returned to water. Silly, cheap, high-heeled shoe intimate article belonging to a servant. She was sorry she had given him found, she could explain it away. . . .

Miss Fryer returned home; she had a great sense of ease, of liberation, as if life had reached a climax, as if she

The first fire burned on the spacious hearth; there was a delicious smell of pastry, of roost meat - preparing for her dinner; her nostrils expanded with relish; she drank two glasses of sherry from the heavy decanter on the side-

Would be be able to carry it through?

She trusted him. And for herself? There might, she supposed, be nights when she would dream of Croom Wood and what might be muttering and wailing there. There might be moments when she would wonder at herself and him. At present she felt exalted. She took off and threw into the fire her gloves soiled with powder-round at the protective faces of her ancestors. A Fryer would know what She had known - without hesitation or a single slip

Now she was tired; she sank into her comfortable chair without removing her neat hat. Her mind, not functionbook. She could our her oen through that relating to Asatha's high heels the bridge would certainly be repaired now. Nor was she likely to forget the blue flowers, emblem of a veiled, an obscure passion - Love-in-a-Mist. She smiled in triumph. How completely he had accepted her helpwithout question, or thanks. She had been right; be was the man whom she

CRRME DE LA CRIME

John Dukyon Carr and his family have come over from England and estiled permanenty in the Unated States, and John is now a member-or-best standing of the MW4 (Mystery Wires of America, Inc.). The Carr line in West-bester County, about three miles from solver your Editor hange his hat and homebress his homicules. In the old days John and your Editor used to talk John by Jong distance orrespondence, now we sit either in the Queen's parter or in John's woodeful study, was its treek [replace].

it tell month and rejerier on the wall, and it sheep, releasing feather charts of Junation test. There is only one wont to Seather the Cart rathey; it is a clubroom, such all the peace and comfort the word implies. Well, one consequently a similar of discussing becopies from such months of problems, your likting top to see the. It was not a new day, that it is worth that as they your likting top to see the. It was not a new day, that it is worth that as they your likting over the peace of the seed of the

Join agreef to this improving a externor in substigating. Having all little and the state of our address designing of Commo Darle, in the state of the substitute of the state of the state

You could see John's mind grasshoppering from author to author. Melville Davisson Post? Of course! An Uncle Abner story — "The Doomdorf Mysney? No, see an Unite Aster away, suprimes at they are, Depker in it would have to be? The Grant Capital from towards used to the contract of the see to The Grant of the see to The Grant of the see to the face of the see to the face of the see to the see t day, "Human Interest Stuff" — you just can't leave that one out the How many does that make This, Suppose us puts on — make it an even ten. Lef's tee, now. a Carnachi story—yet, sudeed. "The Thing mislike" — there' your "leteper" Why, I'll bet that tory has never been unthologised! True, John, but our old friend August Derleth, under the publishing name of Mycroft and Morsa, brought out the first American chilino of William Hope Hologowic consenses it in correct resums. Inter-year, and the first story in the book is "The Thing Investible."

Well, that proves at can't be done; any list of most memorable shorts is bound to be one classic effer another, and all too well-known for reprint in EOMM. But your Editor was still not conveneed. We reminded John that he had selected only nive stories. Finish out the velden ten, nich on more—porhaps that texth story.

John's yes opend wide. There was another story that popped brillianclear may his much. Perhaps it is not one of the em best decemes short ments ever written, but it has powerful recommendation. Witry, politices, full of half and double-bulg, with a first swite short you think no further writt it even possible, and with a number motion in the opening plot sequence that it so ingenious and yet so sardingly simple—

We have instructive that the exercisions had accorded. We sween

the brink of —

John amounced: Ronald Knox's "The Motive."

And now we were sure. The tenth story in John Dichton Carr's list was a "sleeper"!

But inddenly a colosial doubt seized us. A list of John Dickyon Carr's ten favorise detective short stories — and no story by Poe? A list of ten definitive favorites and no mention of "The Purlomed Letter" or "The Murders in the Rue Morgue"? Can such things be? John crushed the doubt with a new was of his hand. Why, of course.

no story by Poe. The Fasher of the Detective Story and his still unsurpassed standard (G, K, Chesserton's phrase) are in a class by themselves. The Poetales of ratiochaston are above competitive listings. Any 'tee tyro knows that! (O, exist, properly sandched)

THE MOTIVE

by RONALD KNO

A craxxin amount of dust is good for a juryman's eyes. It prevents him going to sleep."

Sir Leonard Huntercombe is probably responsible for more scoundrels being at large than any other man in England. His references to the feelings of his client, to the long ordeal which a criminal prosecution involves, British liberties which we all enjoy only on the condition that everybody must be given the benefit of the hand in the till, are a subject of legitimate tedium and irreverent amusement to the reporters, who have beard it all before. But it still goes down with the jury, fresh to their iob; and, after all, that is more important. It does not often happen the old, old argument, whether a defending counsel is justified to of all places, you might have expected him to be free from such annovances in the Senior Common Room of Simon Magus - the smoking-room. to be more accurate. Dons hate a scene, and prefer to talk trivialities after dinner. It is hardly even good form, nowadays, to talk a man's own shop to him. In these days of specialization we are all bored with each other's technicalities, and a tacit convention has grown up that we should stick to the weather and the Boat Race. Sir Loonard was justified, then, if his eye resembled that of a codfish rather more than usual.

rather more than usual.

For, as had lack was conceived, feel guest — Froktidge, the dismatic critic, to show all the world is a stage, and everything, consequently, a fir adhyect for dramatic criticism. It takes less than the Simon

Maga part (though that is powerful and trailed has cost deliberately, with a forthcoming article in view, and had contrived to put Sie Lecuration

but own defrane almost before he advocated the man private without and contrived to put Sie Lecuration

but own defrane almost before he advocated the man Parking without proving a single proving with a single proving without proving a single proving without

McBride, the philosopher, was the host of the great man; and he felt bound to interfere, partly from a sense of hospitality, and partly because he always likes to be desperately just. (Nobody, it has been said, has seen more points of view than McBride, or adopted less.) "I was just thinking," he said, "that perhaps you could put up an apology for Leonard's point of view if you claim that Law should be regarded as one will agree with me - that science ments to the influence of theories which have proved quite false, but it arguable. I mean, in the same way, if only by eliminating error?" Penkridge, who hates dons, was help, "It's not a scientific mind you need in the legal profession," he insisted; "it's a kind of artistic gift. You've got to be imaginative; to throw yourself into the husiness of picturing the story happening as your client innocent, of course, Probably, if we knew, we should find that the truth in many cases is even imagination is what you must have did I ever tell you the story of a client

Several voices demanded that the story should be told; better to have Sir Leonard being prosy, than Penkridge being unmannerly. And Sir Leonard, when his cigar was going, went ahead with the story.

"I first came across Westmacott," ness that never came into court, though it precious nearly did. I was only called in on a minor point to give counsel's opinion. He was a man in late middle age, with an unhealthy give him a very long life, and a depressed, restless sort of manner, as it his mind was preoccupied with something else than what he was talking about at the moment. He had done income he hardly knew what to do friends when he went to stay over Christmas at one of those filthy great luxury hotels in Cornwall. It was the artificial sunlight, and a covered-in bathing pool where the water was night and day. Of course, he might have gone to Cornwall for his health; once to a place like that, because he his views and conservative in his opinions, whereas the Hotel Reple, a cosmopolitan and rather Bobemian crowd. Among the rest there still alive, and you'd all know his name, so I'll call him just Smith, "I'm speaking of some years ago, you'll understand. Nowadays, of course, it doesn't matter what anyhe puts forward; it's all art. But at the time of which I'm speaking, there were still people going about who they were shocked by Smith. It wasn't so much his indecency, though every book he wrote looked as if it was meant to be seized by the police. He was really, if an old fogy like myself can be allowed to use such forgotten language, a bad influence on the young people; everybody adrather admired him for it. Westmacott had never met him before, and the other people in the hotel felt but it off. The curious thing is, they any of Smith's stuff, it appeared; tective stories, which he devoured at the rate of one a day. And - well, strange acquaintances do ripen, and ripen fast, in a god-forsiden place fische Hortel Replanetar.

"It was ladd senson; money wasn't being thomas labor that year at much make the best of the position by on-counging the guest to be a such of family party, with any amount of old-modife festivities. Nutually, a synthesis box's look and Christinas presents, and a synthesic box's head, and a Yude-log specially imported from Sweden, and a set of waste whole Bear and a set of waste whole Bear and a set of waste whole Bear in company—between twenty and thirty of them, when you'd counsed out the invalids word gone to the early, and the ideost who'd gone out in cars for no reason whatever found themselves set down by the master of the revelot to play blind man's ball. This defit go no well, they played it was heard like, or crematorium. It was Westmoott, poole remembered afterwards, who made the suggestion you would have expected to come from asybody but Westmoott—that they should all go and play blind man's ball in the

"Welf, they got some kick out of it after that. Westmand think is got in himself, but he hung about on the edge; as a matter of fact, it was only petrly strong swimmers who did go as, became the both was a matter of the edge and the edge a

that it was perfectly easy, unies you'd got a had sense of direction anyhow. It was meatly midnight when the party went away, and seems that Smith and Westmacost stayed behind to settle their differences with a practical tryout and a bet; Smith was to swim ten lengths in the bath each way, touching the ends every time, but never toutning the sides. They were quite alone when Westmicott adjusted the bandkerchief on his new friend's forehead, to make sure that everything was above-

"Well. Smith did his ten lengths each way, and by his own account made a good thing of it. As he swam he didn't bother to touch the handrail, which was rather high out of the water; but when he'd finished he naturally felt for it - and it wasn't there! He tore the handkerchief off his eyes, which wasn't too easy, and found the whole place was in the anywhere, and he tumbled to what must have happened. Somehow a goodish lot of water must have been let out of the bath while he wasn't looking; and there was nothing to do but go on swimming about until somebody came to out things right for him; or, alternatively, until the he was able to stand on the bottom.

"The second property of the control of the control likely that he would be heard if he shouted. Also, he couldn't quite see how the water could have started emptying itself and then stopped, unless somebody was controlling it.

"Well, they say the devil looks after his own, and it so happened that the night watchman, whom they kept at the Hotel Resplendent (chiefly to keep out of the way when he wasn't wanted), had spotted that the water was running away, and mentioned it to somebody; a search was made, and Smith was pulled out of the water with a rope, none too soon for his peace of mind. Smith was positive, of course, that he had been murderous attack. I say particularly cunning, because, once he had drowned, it would have been easy for Westmacott (he assumed Westmacott was the villain) to have let the water into the bath again; and all the world would have been left supposing that Smith had committed suicide - how else could a strong swimmer have drowned with a handrail in his reach all the time? It looked as if it was going to be a very nasty business, and what didn't make it any better was Westmacott's own explanation, made privately to his lawyers, that the whole thing was a joke, and he had been meaning to rescue Smith later on, Nothing, it was explained to him, is more difficult to predict than a jury's sense of huhush the thing up, chiefly by the hotel people, who thought it meant the end of their business if they were involved in a scandal; I'm not an they were right there, but, as I say, this happened some years ago. The difficulty of Smith's case was that there was no proving it was Westmacott who had tampered with water apparatus (as a matter of fact, anybody could have done it), and it was that hitch that induced the police to let it go; and Smith to be content with a handsome compensa-

"Well, it was touch and go, and there was nothing I expected less than to find Westmacott, to all appearances a dull and unadventurous man, figuring in my line of business again. Though, as a matter of fact, the police had found our thines about him which would have altered my oninion if I'd known about them. His man, fortunately for the police, had done time at an earlier stage in give them information. He assured them that a great change had come over his master within the last week or so before he went to the Resolendent: he had come home one morning looking like a man bowed down by some hideous secret anxiety. though up to then he had been in servants freely, he would start at shadows. He bought a revolver, which the police found in his rooms (he although this only looked like self-defense, it was a more peculiar circumstance that, about the same time.

he got hold of a drug (I forget the name of it now) which is deadly poison, and I'm not sure that he hadn't forged a doctor's certificate to get it.

"It was less than a week after the trouble had died down that a new character came on the scene: a character nobody liked, who had seen him. He was a seedy-looking fellow calling himself Robinson, who seemed very anxious to have an interview with Westmacott, for he made a preat fuss with the servants when he called three times and found he was always out. It was the opinion of the servants that Robinson went about in disguise for no good end, but servants will always say that of anybody who wears dark specracles. When the two did first meet, the servants weren't prepared to say, because Westmacott his visitors himself. Anyhow, for a friends. In fact, if he hadn't been professionally shy of them, I think the man would have gone to the police about it; it looked so much as if Robinson had got a hold of some kind Anyhow, nothing was done about it. Westmacott was a man who fussed about trains, and he was at the station, it seems, a full three-quarters of was worried, apparently, about Robinson - asked the attendant once or twice whether he had shown up yet, and stood looking up and down the platform. As he did this, a telegram was brought to him which seemed to set his mind at rest; he shut humself up in his sleeper, and took no further notice, as far as could be ascertained. Robinson turned up with only two or three minutes to spare, and was bundled hurriedly into the sleeper next door. Whether the two held any conversation was not known; the two sleepers communicated with one another in the ordinary way, and it was only a matter of slipping a bolt

"Robinson, it appeared, was not traveling all the way to Aberdeen, the was to get off at Dunder. He man was to come and call him about three-quarters of an hour before the train got in there. As a matter of fact, he cannot have slept too well, or possibly the lights and the shouting at Ecinburgh woke him, at any rate, he went along the corridor just about for either to enter the other's com-

when they were passing Dalmeny, and spoke to the attendant, who still stood. He said yes, he expected to drop off again for a bit, and he was a heavy sleeper. Indeed, when the attendant knocked at his door, there seemed to be no waking him, and it was locked. With many apologies, the man knocked up Westmacott, and asked his leave to try the communicating door between the two compartments. This, it proved, was locked on Westmacott's side, but not in, and found the carriage quite empty. The bed had been slept in: that is, somebody had bein down on it, there was no mistaking the fact. Robinson's luggage was still there; his watch was hanging by the bunk; a novel he had been reading lay on the floor close by; his boots were there. and his day clothes, not his pajamas.

and his day clothes, nor his pairma.

"Well, there wall allows of limits and bother, as you can imagine, and he had been as you can imagine, but the same and the even, between the time when the attendant saw him in the corridor and the time when his bed was found empty. The train, naturally, had been searched, but without result."

"But they must have found his body," someone suggested "No remains were found; but you have to consider the lie of the journey. Between Dalmeny and Thornton lunction, near which the attendant has to pass over the Forth Bridge. The one interval of time, therefore, during which it was impossible to account for Robinsoo's movements was an interval of time during which a body might, conceivably, have been got rid of without leaving any trace. To disappear, it would have to be weighted, no doubt. But the awkward fact emerged that Westmacott brought a very heavy has with him into the train (the porter gave evidence of this), and it was completely emoty when examined. "As I say, I thought Westmacott the Resplendent affair. I didn't at all like the look of his case when I was asked to plead for him. Wheo I weot to see him I found him all hroken up and in tears. He told me a long story in which he confessed to the murder of Robinson. Robinsoo - it was the old story - had been blackmailing him; he had evidence that it was Westmacott who attempted the murder of Smith in Corowall, I pathered that there were other secrets behind anxious to go into, but it was the fear of exposure over the Smith case that made him reluctaot to bring in the police against the blackmailer. Robinson had insisted on following him when he went north, afraid that he knowledge that he was being shadowed like this was too much for him. and he determined to get rid of his persecutor. Arraogiog for him to travel in the next carriage, he waited till the train was past Dalmeny, then found his man asleep, and laid him other weights onto him as he lay dow just as the train was crossing the

Forth Bridge. "Ordinarily, wheo a man charged with murder tells you he is guilty you can form a pretty good guess between the two obvious alternatives - either he is telling the truth or he ought to be in ao asylum. Occadid not seem to leave any room; he may be inculrating himself to save somebody else. I tell you, I didn't know what to make of it. The whole story seemed wroog; Westmacott was not a strong man, and what would he have done if his man had not been asleep? The chances are enormously against most men sleeping soundly on

"Now, what was I to do? I felt certain the man was not mad, and I have seen many luoatics in my time I did not, could not, believe he was really guilty. I put it to you whether, was not really offering to serve the cause of truth when I urved him (as of course I did) to plead 'Not guilty.'

"He would have none of it then. It was only a day or two later that I had an impassioned appeal to go and see him again. I found his mind entirely altered. He still stuck to his story that Robinson had been blackmailing him, but he professed to know nothing whatever about the disappearance; he thought Robinson must with the sole intention of bringing him, Westmacott, to the dock. He implored me to save him from the gallows. This was too much for me: I couldn't undertake to plead for a man who didn't know from one day to the next whether he was quilty or not euilty, and gave such very lame explanations of his movements and when I had been at him some time. he told me a third story, which was quite different, and, as I believe, true. I shan't tell you what it was just yet. As I say, I thought, and think, it was true. But it was obvious to me from the first that it was a story you could not possibly serve up to a "There was another odd thing, which was that now, for reasons you will understand later, I did not know severe moralists would have formed your consciences in a situation like that, I thanked God I could full back on a legal tradition, and I resolved that I would defend Westmacott. devoting myself single-heartedly to story, whatever it was, the prosecution would bring against him. And, I have ever had a tougher fight; there him amous the public at large, and the jury, as usual, reflected it. But there was the solid fact that no body had been found; the open possibility that Robinson had made away with himself, or slipped off somehow when the train stopped. And, of course, the difficulty of throwing a body clear of the bridge. There was a mass of circumstantial evidence, but not a line of direct proof. Of course, you see McBride, who had been sitting with his head buried in his hands lifted it slowly. "I expect I'm being a fool," he said, "but I don't believe there was any such person as Robinson. He was just Westmacott, wasn't

"That's a theory to go on, at all events," admitted Sir Leonard, accepting the whisky-and-soda with which the suggestion was accompanied. "Let's hear your reasons for thinking that, and I'll put the diffi-

"Well, as you've told the story, nobody ever saw the two men together. When Robinson was seen posed to be Westmacott who had let him in. At the station, there was nothing to prevent Westmacott retting out of his sleeper during that last quarter of an hour, going off somewhere, and putting on the Robinson dispuise, picking up fresh luggage at the cloakroom, and so making his second appearance. He made sure that the attendant should see him at Dalmeny, because he wanted everybody to think that Robinson had been thrown overboard exactly at the Forth Bridge. There was no point in making the body disappear when all the circumstances would, in any case,

"Good for you, McBride; I like to hear a man put a case well. And now let me point out the difficulties. You've got to suppose that a man who has already labored under an awkward imputation of intended murder deliberately projects an alter ego -a sort of Mr. Hyde - for no better purpose than to get rid of his imagipary carcass, thereby letting himself in for a second dose of suspicion. That, to his counsel that he is really a murderer, and then be withdraws it all and decides to plead 'Not guilty,' Can you give a coherent explanation?" "The man was balmy," suggested Penkrxige. "Who isn't, up to a point? But there was certainly method in poor Westmacott's madness, Shall I tell you the story he told me?"

"We'll buy it!" agreed Penkridge. would have bad to start from the moment at which, if you remember, of something over his life. You see, he had been feeling ill for some time. He specialist, and that specialist told him the worst he had been afraid of hearing. Not only were his days numbered, but he must look forward to months of increasing pain, during which, very probably, his reason would be affected. That is the whole story; the rest just flows from it.

"Westmacott hated pain, perhaps more than most of us. He was not capable of facing great endurance. whether in action or in suffering. It didn't take him long to realize that there was only one thing for him to do - to cut his life short by suicide. He went out and bought a revolver with the necessary ammunition. He shut himself up with it, and found that his hand was that of a physical himself with it. Even here be had no better success. He realized, with selfloathing, that he was a man who could not take his own life.

"It is open to you to say, if you like, that something went wrong with of lunacy. If he could not kill himself. he must make somebody else do it for him. He had not the physique to embark on some arduous adventurer fighting, for example, or a difficult mountain climb. Harvoes cannot be hired nowadays. There was only one way he cauld think of inducing some-body else to kill him — and that was to fell somebody else! He must get himself condemned to the gallows. "Well, as you see, he went about

Welf, as you see, he went about creatily sear and areved in that yap palling booth because he knew that he would meet there he sort of propie build be to be the sort of the palling build. So with was there, and Smith was a man who, in his view, would be all the better for externamiation. Salewing him as way to nalive he need. With all that reading of descentive actives, you see, he had become him. While all that reading of descentive store, you see, he had become him while would make it possible for him.

struggle, no circumstances of violence, re-"As it was, something worse spended. By mere accident, the crime not penned. By mere accident, the crime not attempted murder, and penal servitude was no use to him. Rather sheet penal servitude was no use to him. Rather sheet penal pass it off as a poker all he had gained was a poker all he had gained was accused of murder, people would be approximately to be there it against him. He did not attempt a second murder, which more attempts a second murder, which might go as wrong as the first one had gone wrong. He brought Mr. Robinson into existence, and then hurried bim out of existence in the way you have all heard; he had got what he wanted.

"And then, of course, the coward came out in him again, and the close prospect of the gallows frightened him more than the remote prospect of a painful death later on. He broke down, and told me the story as I have been telling it to you. And I saved him; but for the life of me I did not know whether I was doing him a benefit in trying to save him. I simply had to proceed by rule of thumb, and behave as a good advocate should."

"What became of him?" asked

"Fare stepped in, if you like to call it that. At he left the court, rather dizzed with all be had gove through be stumbled at the edge of the pavement in a crowled street, and a lorry was on the top of him before, I think, be knew what was happening. No. I, saw it, and I am certain he didn't throw himself off the pavement. If don't believe be could have, either."

"There's just one comment your strry suggests to me," objected Penkiridge, bitter to the last. "I always thought a lawyer was not allowed to repeat the story told him in confidence by his client?"

"That is why I said that the great gift in the legal profession is imaginativeness. You see, I have been making it all up as I went along."

As we sat down to prepare Thomas Walsh's "Getaway Money" for the primer, we suddenly realized that all we know about Mr. Walsh is his then it crossed our mind that there is one man in New York who knows. We picked up the 'phone and called Joseph T. Shaw Tom Walsh? A salt-of the earth guy, said Captain Shaw. Yes, I've known Tom Walsh for twenty years — bought his first story when I was editor of "Black Mash"
— saw him climb and climb until he is now a steady contributor to "Satter

— Ale nam estimo some estimo del del servicio del servicio del Servicio Pour Malsk's moss outspoken admirers is Octavus Roy Cohen — something about his background? well, he used to be on the "Baltimore Sun" - ves, scratch a uriter and you find a newspaperman - oh, he's a big man, stands higher than six fees and weighs more than two hundred, but he's a big man in other ways too - got the sweetest disposition of any man I ever knew, eventempered, gentle, an understanding guy — yes, that s is: he understands peo-ple, he knows character, and that's the best equipment a seriter can have and how right the old maestro is: strength in characterization is the most precious literary possession a writer can have; it is the secret weapon in a writer's arsenal; it covers a multitude of sins.

GETAWAY MONEY by THOMAS WALSH

P thin pale lips. He said: "I guess When he spoke his voice was tensed, shaky you're topped again." He placed his "I think it's your deal," he said. cards on the table, spread them out The Limited clicked past a crossing. carefully with his fingers, and drew the metallic clatter of its wheels purrin the pile of chips around them. ing softly through the compartment with a rhythmic drowsiness. In the blue dusk outside Drake saw a small Drake saw three aces, a queen, and a Young Jimmy Harris had been the only one to stay. He bent forward his strained boyish face, with the eye hol-lows dark drawn, the mouth desperately narrow, nodding when he saw Pete Mayo's hand. He pushed the cards to Drake, looking dully at him. Copyright, 1943, by Pro-Distributors Publishing Co., Inc.

"Martinsville." Drake said. He looked at his watch, "We're due in at seven; twenty more minutes. The last hand for me, gentlemen." "Then we'll make it hig." loe Madigan said iovially. He had a hearty stone station blur by voice, small merry eyes in a plump, every pale face. While he spoke he looked around the table at the players in turn; at Drake's Saun tanned face white mask, at young Harris' twitted uppnule. Neil Grant, next to Madigan, pushed a hand carestingly through his curly blood hair, smiled with his

"But give me something good, Drake," he said. "You've won altogether too much. If I win this time

I'll buy you something real nice, darling."

The girl on the end of the seat turned suffenly from the window. She said angrily: "Twe sat here for five hours like a fool. I hope you've enjoyed yourself."

Ned Grant said: "Now, darling."
Drake shuffled, dealt the cards, joe Madigun on his left took his five,
tapped them three times on the table
too. He prayed, his eyes rolling comically: "Come up, baby." He grinned at Drake as he said it, then spread the cards out slowly in his cupped hands, squinting at each revealed corner.

"It's open," he said. "Get in for the gravy, boys."

They all stayed around to Drake. He held three fours, an ace, a ten. He took two chips from his stack and flipped them to the table center, smiling at Joe Madigan. "You wanted it hig," he said. Neil Grant pursed his lips in a soft whistle; after a moment he threw his cards down, pushed back from the

ity. He growled: "Damn if you ain't patting the whip to me this trip. I'm staying."

Pete Mayo spoke in a low voice, metal hard without resonance. He said: "Bigger, Joe." His chips juggled a little with the swinging of the car as he tossed them out. Jimmy Harris grinned nervously.

Jimmy Harris grinned nervously.

His eyes were wide, very dark in his face, as he met both raises.

face, as he met both raises.

"I'm kicking it," Drake said. He put out three chips.

Madigan stayed. Pete Mayo didn't raise again. His calm eyes were blank, Madigan drew three eards, Pete Mayo one, Jimmy Harris one. Drake picked up his hand again, considered, played one of the hunches he had played one of the hunches he had been winning on all afternoon. He tossed the ten into the discard, held the ace as kicker, and drew one from the stack. Madigan's face was jovial again.

"Cost the boys two," he crowed. When he finished speaking the door to the cornidor opened, and a very small, very lean man came in. His face was shrewd, wizened, holding beady black eyes like brightly painted dabs

Drake glanced at him. "Last hand, Nieky. Be right with you."

The dried-apple face grinned cock-

The dried-apple face grinned cockily. "Oke," it answered. He came over with brisk movements and stood behind Drake's chair.

Pete Mayo's cold eyes were detached, blank, He took two chips from his heap and placed five more beside limmy Harris drew in his line and licked them with his tongue tip. His face was easer, glowing, "And five again," he said.

Drake looked at his hand. He saw the ace of hearts he had held, the three fours next, and he spread the cards a little to reveal the one on the end he had just drawn. It was the ace of diamonds. He felt Nicky's breath slightly hotter on his neck, He said: "Once more, gentlemeo."

loe Madigan slapped down his cards. "To heil with it," he grumbled. "You took me for three eees. That's coough." He looked dark and fretful puffing at his cigar.

Pete Mayo raised again, the boy raised. Drake raised. Joe Madigan said: "Dumn if it sin't a pot," and leaned forward, his little eyes greedy on the soaring pile of chips. Neil Grant hummed, his hands in the pockets of his tweed suit, his face handsome, sardonic,

Pete Mayo bet steadily, young Harris began to call, Drake raised back. The boy wasn't so sure now; his face was drawn uncertainly, the ever flicking in rapid panicky ares from one to the other. When he met

Mayo's last raise the space before him held a lone white chip. Drake said: "I'm calling, Mayo." Pete Mayo arched his penciled black brows, looked incredulous, and laid his cards down. He was holding an ace high straight. Jimmy Harris laughed suddenly - a sharp sound that had the relief, the breaking from tension, of a sob, He cried: "But it's no good, Mayo, I've -" He stopped speaking, looked at the five spades he spread wide before him, then up to Drake's gray eyes without raising his head, without, Drake thought, breathing, Drake nodded, looking disgusted,

He pursed his lips and threw his hand irritably into the discards, ousbed his seat back from the board. Behind him Nicky's mouth dropped. He began "What in the hell did you -" with his voice getting louder oo each word. Drake's glance moved coldly at him and he stopped, his eyes astounded. Joe Madigan's plump face was pout-ing. "Not my luck to win that," he said sourly, "They took us this time.

He set his eigar on the rim of the board, bent to one side, and boisted up a small leather portmanteau from the floor. A mass of papers on the ton. removed, displayed a greenish edge of bills, massed in without order in overlapping heaps. Neil Grant, his smile bright, facetious, said: "Mr. Money Man Madigan. Carries the cash with him. Some day, friend, that habit will get you "Safer than a bank," said Madigan.

He leaned forward, his eyes hard, probing. "With this, Neil." Drake looked at a shoulder-holster inside the bookmaker's coat, saw a revolver butt black against worn leather. Madigan tapped it, grinned thinly. "They see

Pete Mayo piled his counters without speaking, looking down at them danger body and said: "I'll be seeing you," to no one in particular. limmy Harris stacked his chips and nushed them across to Madigan. He made extravagant motions with his hands, laughed buoyaotly as he spoke. "What a break I got! I figured Mayo for a straight on his one draw -I wusn't afraid of him. But Drake over here -" He grinned, looking up, mopped back his dark hair with one hand, "What did you have, anyway?" Drake said, sbruggiog: "It doesn't Madigan finished paying off and clicked the leather bag shut. He grinned again, heartily, the hail fellow well met. "They better ruo right tomorrow, or little locy will be down to getaway money."

He took a folded hundred dollar bill . from his vest pocket, patted it, kissed it, but it back, "Four years that's been in the old sock. If the boys keen hittiog me like they did these last few meetings, I'll be using it. What you por in the Derby, Drake?"

"Oh, ves." Neil Grant said, His eyes were sleepy, half closed, with the brown glitter oarrowed in them. "You really owe us a tip after taking all our money." Smiling brightly, gady, be smoothed down his hair with one careful hand, "You have a reputation, you know - the bookmaker's baoe, Chicago Drake, the man of mystery.

Stroog, silent, and extremely fortucate. Do pass me the good word; I'll take Joe's money, as a friend." "Sorry," Drake said. His tone was blaod, withdrawn, "I don't know a the handle of the brown leather has. "I hope you're coming clean, Chicago. You took me for plenty last meeting. The boys are beginning to mark you down as no bargain. Me. I'd hate to take your money on a brewery naz," Neil Graot said. "Oh, come on,

Drake. A good word to a friend -" Drake said, "Sorry," again, without displaying sorrow in his faintly smiling face. He bowed to the girl, waved corridor behind Nicky's enome-like

Two Pullmans up they entered another compartment, and before the door was closed behind them Nicky exploded. He barked; "What in the hell was the matter? Almost four grand on the board, a gay with a straight, a guy with a flush, and you -" Nicky choked, souttered. looked at once bewildered and savage - "you with nothing at all in your mitt but a lousy full house. Why -"

Drake said: "He's Pop Harris" boy." He whistled over the bag, not looking at the little man, "I guess he was playin' with Pop's money, three grand of it.

Nicky nodded his head, "Pop Harris' boy," he said slowly, "So that's the why. Your old nal Poo - and the kid's his. I heard about the boy; he's been tearm' things open since Pop bit o' jock. That's -" Drake growled: "Cut it out, I'm not giving anybody anything - oot even Pop's kid. He had me beat, that's in the pot."

"Sure, sure." Nicky mimicked him with a distorted swagger, a bitter heartiness of tone. 'Two aces doo't count with three fours, I know, But if Mayo had the kid beat, I got a hunch Pete would have lost the pot anyway. Lost to a full."

Drake said: "Don't bet on buoches, You'd always lose,"

Chicago Drake left his hotel room a little after eight that evening. He bought cigarettes at the stand downstairs, lit one at the gas flame before the counter, and crowded his way, the press of people filling the lohby. Out on the street he whistled a passing cab to the curh, got in, and gave the driver directions. Fifteen minutes later the taxi turned off the main road to a graveled lane lit by a string of colored hulbs, rumhled past a clump of trees to an open space hazily green with concealed lights. Drake got out and paid the driver

High, sweet smelling stacks of hav flanked him as he went forward. On a hulding before him the word Havstary flicked on and off against a ramshaekle wooden building that resembled too ohviously a baro, with premeditated spots of rustic and quaint antiquity dotted across the

at the door and escorted him inside. The air was warm, sweetish with the mixed odors of gin and liquors. It ered, with the only light a palish halo at the end of the long room, wherein a moaned mournfully through the clos-

Drake threaded his way behind the waiter through a vague whiteness of tables, catching stray snatches of talk, a woman's low laugh. It was too dark for him to distinguish faces; but all around him colored evening gowns and starched shirt froots blurred together in movements under the pink light that retreated confusedly into the shadows from the silver glitter of the singer's hair. Drake sat down and

"My man's go-ooo-ooe." The orchestra surged suddeoly up from under the blue cadences of the girl's voice, overpowered it, and crashed hrassy notes in crescendo against walk and ceiling. The lights woot oo, very hrightly.

Drake looked about him. Four tables away from him his eye caught the bright glitter of Neil Grant's hair, plauded the sioger. Jimmy Harris sat oo his left, between him and the girl; he was smoking, a faint, absent frown the table Pete Mayo's cameo cold face was remotely absorbed above the sleek small body; his glance crossed Drake with the barest perceptible widening of recognition. He made no other and other syn.

The waiter brought Drake's order and he began to eat, When he had finished the band was playing and insided the shad was playing as wife synopasion of notes that winkled rapidly under the samphones' than lament. Pete Mayo got up and went outside; Neil Grant and the girl left the table to dance. Drake wondered where Joe Madagan was as he arose and sancked a way through the dancers to where young Harris was sitting alone. Drake nodded to his nod, looked narrowly at the boy over his cigarette end, noting the uncertain flexible end, noting the uncertain flexible curve of his mouth, the dark gleam of something unrevealed in his eyes. He said: "How are they coming, Jimmy?" "So so." Jimmy Harris smiled twitchily, looked away. He tried to twitchily, looked away. He tried to make his voice forceful, hearty. He didn't succeed. "Looking for something good in the big race tomorrow. Got anything, Drake?"

Got anything, Drake?"

"Maybe I have," Drake said quietly, "If you want it, Iimmy —"

A small, squarely set man bumped side a dancing couple, stopped at their table with a loud whost of expelled breath. His face was small, red, folly. He said cheerfully: "Helio, Drake," and looked down at the boy with the same expression, "You limmy Harrise and the same companies of the same limmy Harrise and the same companies of the same companies."

Blood faded from Harris' face, leaving it sheet-like. The dark something in his eyes flamed higher, spread. He made groping motions with his hand, started to get up, looked at Drake. He said: "Yes—yes," in a breathless, excited voice. "Proctor," Drake said. He glanced

"Proctor," Drake said. He glanced up at him from the boy, puzzled. "What are you doing out here?" The short man, still cheerful, jerked

The short man, still cheerful, jerked his head downward. "I guess he can tell you."

tell you."

Jimmy Harris started to speak, choked, blurted out: "I didn't kill him, I went in there for something I forgot, When I—"

The short man said: "But you knew he was killed, Jimmy? Why didn't you call somebody? Why you didn't makes it kinda tough on you, Kid."
He looked across the dance-floor and andded to a burly wan by the entrance. Then he said: "Get your hat."

"Wait a minute," Drake put in slowly, "What's the point? This isn't a game of charades, Proctor?"

Proctor looked down at him, little eyes bright. "Nope," he said. "Not charades. It's a game called bing bing and hot foot, Drake. Joe Madigan's it.
He got tagged, knocked off, rolled down the chutte. He's crasked."

and "joe Madigan!" Drake's incredulous voice matched his eyes, his wide to mouth. "But — I played cards with him this afternoon, Proctor. When — What you picking up the boy for?"
Proctor explained, a little innutiently: "For questioning. They found Madigan's body in his compartment on the Limited half an hour after it pulled in. When we went down to look things over the conductor and porter give us the names of the guys Grant, Pere Mayo, the kid." His thumb flipped briefly to Jimmy Harris. "The conductor saw this lad coming out of Madigan's compartment as the kid's face was white as hell. He looked all upset." Proctor shrueped. "What would you figure it?" Jimmy Harris cried desperately:

"But I told you I forgot samething my cigarette case," His eyes were dark, terrified in the pallor of his face. He held his arm rigid on the table, half lifting him out of his chair-"When I went back to get it I saw him. I got scared, Maybe I didn't use my head. I thought if I told -" got nothing to do with that, brother They won't hang you tonight. All I was told was bring you down for questioning. If I was you I'd come along peacefully," limmy Harris podded dully, He said: "All right." He got up, not the doorway. Proctor followed him. The burly man turped, flanking them carefully. An instant later Pete Mayo came in head over his shoulder to watch. Then he faced about, marched precisely, with his small contained arrogance, across the room. He said to Drake: "What's the parade for?" in a tone casual, pleasant. His voice affable, he asked: "You don't know, Pete? Some little something. The boys played thing?"

Pete Mayo stopped smiling; the grave cold mask dropped down over sive. He stared at Drake, said: "You speaking English? Drake didn't answer, didn't look at Neil Grant and the girl when they came up. He pushed back his chair and crossed the dance-floor in crisp Drake felt lonely and a little cold, thinking of Pop Harris, Old Pop! The best friend a man ever had.

And his boy now up for murder. The yellowish sheen of a taxi left its line near the road and rumbled to him. With one foot on the running-board, Drake said: "Police Headquarters. And step on it." He got back to his room shortly loudly to an incoherent solutter of iazz. Before it Nicky was trying dance steps on the rug, with a cigarette in saw Drake's face he stopped, looked serious, shut off the radio with his "Bad?" he asked, "I couldn't figure

what you wanted in the phone call."

and lit a cigarette before speaking, His voice poured out rapidly, earn-Nicky. They picked up Jimmy Harris on suspicion. He owed Madigan eight thousand dollars in unpaid bets, I saw him at Headquarters and he admitted that to me. But the considen't know about that yet."

Nicky said, wide mouthed, "Hey! Wait a minute! Joe Madigan croaked?

Drake explained, briefly, He went on: "Proctor let me see the boy at Headquarters. He says Grant and the girl left Madigan's compartment before he did, and that when he got to his seat three cars down he remembered he'd left his cigarette case on the table. Then he got out his bags, brushed up a little in the smoking compartment - five minutes altogether - and went back for it. Madigan was lying on the floor with blood all over the back of his head. It frightened him so much that he didn't tell anybody, but just sneaked out, He figured, too, the eight thousand might make it look bad for him." Nicky stopped scowling, stopped prodding his thumb at some side teeth long enough to say: "So what?" Drake's eyes were bitter, slitted; he moved his head impatiently, stared before him. After a while be said: "Madigan carried money in that leather bug of his. A good bit of money. You and I knew that -so did every regular at the races - and that includes Mayo and Neil Grant, The bug was empty when they found Madigan. So he was killed for the money. An ordinary stick-up man wouldn't take Madigan on the train - it would be easier, safer to get him in town. Figure it like that - a job done without planning, for money, Harris was away five minutes; plenty long enough for anybody who had left before him to come back and knock over Madigan."

Nicky said. "I think you're hinting bost."

Drake's smile was brief, grim-"Smart boy, Nicky. We got in at seven, too late for the money to be banked. So it's reasonable to suppose the killer still has the money somewhere around him." "That means?" Nicky asked.

"That means," Drake said, "we search two rooms in this hotel. Neil Grant's and Mayo's - maybe Grant's girl, too."

Nicky grimaced, "Nice and easy, Just like that?"

Drake said; "Just like that." He went to the phone on the table and jiggled the hook. He said: "Mr. Mayo's room, please," When the connection was made he listened to the long ring, perhaps twenty times before the operator cut in, "Sorry, sir, Your party does not answer. Drake jerked impatience into his tone. "They're in, operator. They must be in. Sure you're ringing the right party? What room number are you trying?"

The operator said: "Yes, sir. Room nine-o-six, Mr. Mayo." Drake said: "Thank you," and hung up. He told Nicky: "Mayo's out; we'll try him first. Nine-o-six - that's Miss Carrigan's floor, Amorous Car-He grinned, rubbed his blunt chio with nicotined fingers, snapped them suddenly before him. "Not so tough to crash it if she's on duty. Nicky, you go down to the lobby and hang around the elevators. When you see Pete Mayo come io ring nine-o-six on the dot. Got that?"

"Nine-o-six," Nicky nodded. "Right." His face clouded a little. "I don't like it, boss. Suppose you find dough; how you gonna prove it was Madigan's? And this Mayo is tough. I bear a vaco be's a killer down from Detroit, Bad boy, If-" Drake said contemptuously: "He's a little rat. As for the money — we plan from that when we find out where it is. If things break -" He stopped, shrugged, beckoned Nicky out to the corridor.

Several minutes later he left the elevator at the ninth floor, stepping into a small reception room ornately carpeted, with a small desk at one side behind which a stout woman of forty, with plump rosy cheeks, sat reading an evening paper. Drake smiled widely, advancing, "Miss Carrigan," he cried, heartily, "Well, well! How are you?"

The floor clerk blinked surprisedly, took a moment to look cov. She squealed in a flutter of emotion: "But it's Mr. Drake! Ob, I'm so glad to see you! But I had hoped you'd be on my floor this time, too. I want to take hoped so, too. But they stuck me upstairs, on the twelfth. "By the way, Miss Carrigan, Mr. Mayo isn't in, is he?" He smiled confidentially, beot closer, "We're going to play a little joke on Pete - Mr. Mayo. You know -" He waved his hand vaguely, smiling at her, winked one eye meaningly. "I know it's against the rules, but if you could let me have the pass key to his morn for just a few moments --Miss Carrigan looked doubtful, then wavered, surrendered, under the

Drake took the key not too quickly. contrived to look pleasant and good naturedly mysterious, and escaped into the corridor with a last meaning nod. Outside Mayo's room he looked at his watch. Half past eleven. If

Mayo came home from the Haystack early -The lock vielded easily, without sound. He groped for the switch on the wall, found it, and light swooped at a click after instantly banished

He went first to the closet door and yanked it open, pulling forth the two dark leather traveling hars it contained. They were unlocked, half empty, and he thumbed rapidly through the contents. There was nothing interesting. He drew out the dresser drawers, tossing aside shirts, underwear, handkerchiefs. He found nothing. There was a bathroom at one side and he crossed to this and went in. Behind the mirror the white metal cabinet contained the usual toile: things. Nothing else. Drake fingered them irritably, flipped through the Turkish towels on the rack, and turned back.

Pete Mayo was in the bedroom, with his small, well-tailored back against the closed corridor door. He was dressed in a tuxedo, with a black banded straw hat on his head. He was frowning a little—a very tiny brow contraction of puzzlement. There was a revolve in his right head. He wait of the contraction of puzzlements where we have the contraction of puzzlements.

a revolver in his right band. He said to Drake: "Sit down." Drake shrugged, feeling like a petty thief, started to speak as the phone on the bedside table tinkled out over his words. Watching him, Pete Mayo stepped the two paces to it. He said.

voice when his left band brought it up to his lips. Drake heard a staccato mutter from the other end. Nickly, of course. What in bell bad kept bim? Now. . . .

Pere Mayo put down the receiver without saying anything else. His palely abstracted eyes glided over the room, the heaps of clothing on the floor, the open closet door and the two apping traveling bags. He said again, looking at Drake: "Six clown." When Drake didn't move, Mayo's marrow body seemed to contract, to tense and draw in without motion. It tense and draw in without motion, It can draw in without motion of the compet. The proposeful, when the proposeful and the proposeful an

and when he scoke his flat voice was toneless. He said: "I don't tell you small exquisite features; in their white glistening sheen something flamed paler and more merciles than fire. He realized in the instant that he moved to obey that Pete Mayo would shoot —that Pete Mayo wanted to shoot.

He was cold, not afraid, wary. He stand down. Crossing to him, betted him, Pete Mayo's steps were soundless, light, as if there were no weight in his body. He said; "Per your hands behind you." Drake obeyed, felt a thin loop fasten about his wrists, grow tighter until the edge of it

He moved suddenly, knocking his chair back, jerking his body to one side as the fell. Metal flashed in the light above him, crushed hard, cold, on to bis skull. He felt no pain. Red light streamed like drunken lightning, across his eyeballs, burst in a crimson glow that expanded and covered the

When he could see again he was on the floor, on his side, his head pushed against the cold metal roller of the bed. His legs were bent up a little, fastened to bis arms. Someone stemed to beat with a great muffled hammer at the inside of his skull. It was very painful.

His eyes roamed dully around the room, packed out Pete Mayo's slender form before the dresser. The pale man was silent, attentive to the cord beld.

was silent, attentive to the cord beld in his widely separated hands, snapping it once, twice. He turned to The perfect oval of Mayo's face was absorbed, very white. His arms, his legs, moved in a delicate precision as he crossed the rug. He knelt before Drake, turning Drake's bound body

Drake stared up at the ceiling cluster of bulbs, watched them contract, dim, flow out and expand to an enormous brilliance. The hammet kept thudding inside his skull, and he felt the blows of it all over his body like a heart beating with intolerable force. He could not think clearly, a formless surge of dark gray rolled forward and back in alternate waves inside his skull.

He shook his head, annoyed. He tried to speak to Pete Mayo. He wanted to ask him what the hell was the matter. But something soft and bulky was forced far back in his mouth, parting his jaws, rubbing conserly assign his tongue. The sound

Drake made was boarse, moaning.
Pett Mayo lifted Drake's head, passed something under it, put it back. The something was sender, ridged. Drake rolled his eyes down heavily and swu one of the small when hands one either side of his neck. The hands one either palm to him, with the fingers elenched down on the hing they held. Pete Mayo crossed wrists, transferred the cord ends from one to the other. It be began to be reathe

He drew his arms apart slowly. The cord slid a bit on Drake's throat, then tightened. The monstrous hammer stopped beating inside his head and his body, below the neck, grew intensely hot. Trying to move, to struggle, he discovered in the queer fog of his mind that he could no longer becathe. Above him the milky white balls of Pete Mayo's eyes specad with a steady growth over the pale ness of each irin, leaving them blank, horvible.

Fire scorched Drake's throat, biting at the tissue. He twisted his head, threw back his body madly, withed on the floor. Pete Mayo was laughing; his arms tensed and drew wider; the complete whiteness of his eyes gave to his face the expression of an idiot.

Drake's mind awar down and down, became infinitesimal, in the giant's statute of his body that seemed to fill the room, to rower and broaden in the swiking streams of brilliam light that citeded him in the empty space of saaring. For a moment, the highest cleared, and the pain stopped. He could see. He was quite peaceful, and the pain supper the model of the paint of the marrow, the model of the paint of the marrow. Then the lights came again, and fadet slowly, silently, to grayness.

Out of the grayoess Nicky whimpered, his face frightened: "Gosh Almighty, boss, I thought the rat put you down. I been workin' on you for ten minutes. You —."

ten minutes, You —"
Drake with an immense effort pushed the upper part of his body erect, resting it against the bed. Nicky's voice droned meaninglessly around him. His throat seemed swellen, dry, and packed with harsh cotton burning slowly. When he tried to speak be made a croaking sound; it sounded so funny to him that he laughed. He laughed, putting he head back against the metal bar.

lead back against the metal bar.
Nicky said: "Now, boss — now, boss," looking wildly around the room. He got up and ran across the floor that billowed under Drake's eyes in slow steady waves. Drake woodered, interestedly, bow he did it.
Pete Mayo was lying before him, on his fire. He was curious too, about that. Nicky came back, his eyes distracted, and slopped water from a glass down on him. Drake reached greefily for the tumbler, got it, and sobsed the fault down the fiery tube of his throat. It hurt going down, but when he bad swallowed it he felt better, more normal. He managed to

"——!" sighed Nicky, over a long breath. "Boss, I'll tell you—" Drake croaked again, pointed his finger at Pete Mayo and raised insquing brows.

Nicky scowled, spoke slowly, with hatred, "The lossy little rar. I saw him come in, but a dizzy operator gave me the wrong number. When I got 405 I recognized his voice say hells. I made out I had the wrong lunc, asked for Joe. Then I came up here to wait in the ball. I didn't know what to 66. But after a while I got nervous—the door won't locked out on the property of the same up to the same up to the same up to the same up to be same upon the same upon the

the rone around your neck and I saw his hands pullin' it." Nicky reached out with his foot and pushed it into Pete Mayo's side. "So there was a chair bere and I smacked him with it. Which is all, boss." Drake looked and saw a chair printered by the body. He rasped: "Dead?"

Nicky said: "No," regretfully.
"But he won't feel like doin' much for the rest of the night."

Drake nodded, steadying himself with one hand on the footrail of the bed. His mind felt light and uncoatrolled; he had a constant desire to burst out laughing. There seemed to be something inexpressibly funny in the back of his head but he could not stick where it may think what it was.

Nicky's arm helped him to the door and out into the hall. The diminer light there was grateful to his pain streaked eyes, though the corridor itself seemed narrow and infinitely long. He staggered a little, pushed away Nicky's arm, but managed to reach Miss Carrigan's desk steadily reach Miss Carrigan's desk steadily enough.

Her face gaped in surprise when she saw him. "Why, Mr. Drake," she said. or Her bright little nose saifted sus-

I siciosty seemed to wiggles the shoot below the seemed to wiggle the shoot below the seemed to the over gasping. Before him the metal doors of the elevator shaft drew noiselessly apart, and Neil Grant and the stant, to roar assin with bughter, Neil Grant smiled, not understanding, but brightly "What ho!" he said. "A large evening for the boys." Drake boomed: "I'm drunk. I'm drunk as bell! I want to blow things up, Grant. High's sky, higher!" He threw one hand clumsily to the ceiling, let it plop down on the blond man's shoulder. He shook him playfully, his eyes cunning, his mouth pleading. "And I want one more drink before I blow. One more. How about it, friend?" Nicky looked angry. "Come on." he growled. "What the hell's the matter with you?" He shook his head disgustedly.

Drake leered: "He thinks I'm drunk. Mel" The great laughter roared forth, reverberated. "Me, Grant!" He spoke quietly, confidentially in the hourse whisper of an intoxicated man, "I've got a tip - a good tip. On the Derby, Grant. For you. You're my friend." He half closed one eye, put his head to the side, moved a finger before his face, "But you've got to give me a drink, friend, to get it. Just one. I'm dying

Neil Grant took his arm. The brown eyes were bright, gay. His glance shot to the girl warningly as she said: "For crying out loud --" and stopped when she caught his look. presence, with the girl annoved,

The blond man's room was nine eleven, two doors down across the corridor from Pete Mayo's, Inside, Drake sprawled in a chair, breathing heavily, as if asleep. He didn't move until

Neil Grant brought him a glass of Then he got up, lunging to one eved: "All right, friend. You'll excuse -the lady-" He hiccoughed, bowed to the girl, wavered with drunken dignity past ber. He lurched inside, biccoughed again, closed the There he crossed steadily enough to the bosin. In the mirror his face stared back at him, darkly congested, the eves bleary. He grinned without mirth. Not hard to convince anybody he was blotto, looking that way, There was a livid mark apparent on his neck when he bent forward, and he pulled the linen collar of his shirt higher to conceal it.

From his inside pocket he took a pen and a small leather notebook. On one of the unlined pages in back he wrote rapidly: "Go downstairs phone Detective Proctor at Police Headquarters. Get him over as soon as you can and wait for him. Ther hring him right up. Don't mind any thing I say before Grant." He put back the pen, folded the pa his palm, then can the water thirty seconds before going out. In the bed-room he saw the girl had gone, and looking sourly at him from the bed. Neil Grant was handsome, gracious. "About that tip?" he smiled.

"Oh, no," Drake said, cunningly. "Not that way, friend. Firsht - the drink." He picked up the class of Scotch, drained it, continued: "A cigarette - must have smoke." He lurched over to Nicky's scowl, said: "Whass matter, kid? No fun? Come on, get hot," Nicky gave him a pack of cigarettes and he took one out, lit it. Under the cardboard box, as he returned it, he slid the piece of paper, pressing it into Nicky's palm.

Neil Grant said, his words eager, fast: "But the tip, Drake? You're not going to forget that?" "Thirty to one," Drake said, "That's what she'll pay. Got that?

Now -" he turned to Nicky. "You get Brannigan, bring him up here, right away." He roared suddenly:

Nicky looked sallen, puzzled. He held the pack of cigarettes in his hand. besitated a moment, then at Drake's clumsy pass went across to the door and out. Drake dropped on the bed, turned over, began to snore. Ten minutes later Nicky and Proctor came in. Drake lifted himself dully, rubbed his eyes, boomed out: "Brannigan, pall I'm ringing a friend in, got it? All my friends in, Good thing - can't miss."

looking at Neil Grant The blond man appeared uncertain.

He said: "But you haven't told me the horse's name." Drake said: "All right, Brannigan's my commissioner - places money. Spreads it around - Chicago, St.

Looey, New York, Wires it like that, just before race time. Then it's put down. Then no chance to beat down odds, unnerstand? Still high, thirty to one. But the money mustn't be bet at track. That knocks down odds, beats hell out of 'em. Unnerstand?" He made a sweeping motion with his hand, "Okey, friend, You give Brannigan five thousand dollars, now,

"Five thousand dollars!" Neil Grant pressed his lips far out, then drew them together into his cheeks in a grimace that resembled a smile. "I don't know that I -- " Drake mared with sadden violence

"Then to hell with you! I don't have to beg the tip. Do I have to beg it? Do I. Brannigan? No piker money goes down with Chicago Drake." He got off the bed, said again, hitterly: "To hell with you!" and lurched for the door, "Let's go down for a drink, Brannigan

Neil Grant's voice and smile were conciliatory. "Don't be like that, Drake, I'll get it, A minute -" He went over to the closet, entered it, was concealed by its door for thirty seconds. When he came out there was a large manila envelope in his hand, Without speaking he placed a sheaf wise at Drake, the brown glitter in Drake was bossterous and his voice was loud. "Tip on Gallant, boy. You got it now. Five grand there, Branni-Proctor took up the bills, flipped each one straight in the center like a bank teller, and counted them out upon the table. There were three five-hundred-dollar-bills, the rest hundreds, older, more used, than the Proctor reached three thousand, four. They all watched him. He droned: "Forty-five hundred --"

Drake said: "Wait a minute." His face hardened, became clear, and he lost his drooling smile. He reached over and picked up the hundred dollar brought it close to his eyes, nodded looked up at Neil Grant. He said:

"You killed Joe Madigan." The blood man kept smiling: his eyes kept bright. He said softly:

"You're not drunk, Drake. You tried to trick me." "I'm not drunk," Drake said. He held the bill taut between fingers, read off the serial number, "06001113, That was Madigan's getaway money - his lucky bell. Ended in thirteen; Joe was superstitious about it. He'd had the bill for years, and everyone that knew him knew that. This afternoon in the train you saw him take it out of his yest pocket and kiss it and put it back. He said something - 1 forget. But when you went back to kill him you didn't forget to take it. after you'd taken the bug. Pretty cheap, Grant, So cheap it's point to hang you,"

Neil Grant said, shaping his mouth: "No." He leaned forward, soft voiced smiling, triumph relaxing his mouth, brown eyes. "No, Drake. Shall I tell you why?" He chuckled, looking around at each of them in turn, "Because it isn't loc's getaway money. The killer might have known that too - known the thirteen Joe was superstitious about. But they'll find search his suit. That's the one thing you didn't know, Drake." Drake said slowly: "I didn't know. Grant. Only one man did know. The man that murdered Madioan."

Neil Grant looked thoughtful, not concerned, nodded after a moment. "Yes," he said. "You'll call as wityour friend? Yourself?" He laughed aloud. "We know it, Drake. We three Unfortunately there isn't a judge, a iury, to hear, So -"

Proctor lost his cheerfulness; his voice grew surly, his face hard. "Uh-huh," be said, "You got-me wrong, mister. My name's Proctors

He lunged for Grant, staggered back with blood flowing from his nose at the snapping of the blond man's arm, swift and keen like a rapier, Nicky stargered, went down under a ing from the chair, barred the corridor

But Neil Grant disfn't move for that; he raced back, his handsome face sullen, hard, with dark horror coating the eyes. Proctor's body contorted by the table and drew up, and shots - one, two - crashed over one another in the narrow walls of the Neil Grant made the bathroom door - staggering, he made it, and cheked it behind him. Proctor, squinting, brushing the red stream He said to Drake: "A way out from Drake shook his head, coming across, and together with the short man threw his body against the door. There was a sound from inside. The scraping whine of a raised window. Proctor grunted breathless: "Fire-

"No." Drake said, "But I think he knows that," Proctor looked at him, pulled down his mouth corners, said: "I should worry." He placed his revolver close to the door, fired twice, again, then pushed out the lock and went in. The room was empty. Thin curtains fluttered lightly in the night breeze from the open window. When Drake crossed to it and looked out he saw, far below, long lines of small things like ants scurrying along the light-knot of them below him, and the long lines converged on this. But there was an open space in the center, with something spread out, and this the

In the elevator Nicky said: "How did you figure him in, boss? After Mayo tried to crook you -" . Drake's tired face moved irritably.

"My throat hurts like hell," he said. He put up fingers and rubbed it ten-derly. "They got a name for men like Pete Mayo, but I don't know what it is. The act of death means something to him that life itself doesn't. He loves death too much to be quick about it. He wouldn't have shot Madigan on the train - too ahrupt for his fancy, too dangerous. He's a professional. He saw right off what I was trying to pin on him, and, catching me where it was all on his side, he would have killed me. If he wasn't a little insane he would have shot me at once.

"I wasn't sure it was Grant: but when I figured it wasn't Mayo, the odds were it was Grant and I was certain it couldn't have been limmy Harris, So I took the chance, Miss Carrigan thought I was drunk; when Grant got off the elevator I knew he thought the same. I played it up."

Sirens screamed as they crossed the lobby; a heavy car slid past the front windows and braked, whining, to a stop. Two men came out of it with a Fulton Oursler (slas Anthony Abbot), creator of Thatcher Colt, detective, and Rupert Hughes, creator of Dirk Mentling, criminal, combine then rich talents on the strange story of Henry Duolpin, the member of a murder jury who went to extraordinary length to live dangerously.

THE THRILL IS GONE

by FULTON OURSLER and RUPERT HUGHES

was not the beginning of a new life for Henry Dawkins, as many of his friends supposed, but the logical new step in a strange and long-concealed pattern that stretched from his cradle to the courtroom. The hidden passion of Henry's heart was a desire for excitement, a was a small, freckled man with volcanic blue eyes and he worked in a piano factory in one of the distant and almost uninhabited reaches of the Bronx. He lived not far from the plant in the third floor front of a rooming house. In his room was a secondhand detective and Western novels. Henry could not play the piano and had bought his instrument merely to make the proper impression on his employer. Neither was he a detective or a cowboy, but he lived in a storybook world, always hoping that some day something would happen to him. And one day something

There came in Henry's mail a summons for jury duty. As he was not

s acquainted with the defendant, had never been arrested, and had no prejudices against capital punishment, he was acceptable to both sides, and so became a member of the jury.

The prisoner was Wilma Bowers, a widow, and the charge was that she had willfully, and knowingly, and with malice aforethought, dropped into her husband's beer coough cyanide of potassium to kill a horse. Mrs. Bowers admirred having hought the poison but only at her husband's command. She admitted also that she had induced him to take out a life insur ance policy for ten thousand dollars. proper wifely prudence. Finally she asserted that her husband had suffered from chronic headaches and dosed his own beer with poison because he was tired of pain. In fact, he wrote a suicide note and left it on the table in the hall. Unfortunately, in the distraction of her grief, Wilma could not remember where she had could not remember where she had mislaid this vital document. "A likely story!" flared the district attorney, rolling his eyes at the jury. But Dawkins was not listening to the

Fulton Oursler and Rupert Hugher

tate only on the levely prisoner. Henry thought that Wilma was a faciniting, glamorous cream. The modest dressing of her dark hair, the hope and fear in her large eyes, the curvacious figure, made the blood includescent in his veins, In fact, he barely heard the impossioned argument of grocecutor and counsel for

The fine vote in the jury soon was eleven to one for a wrelet of gailty. The one supisital ballet was Henry 5. When he resided that all the other eleven to the first of the first of the properties of the proper

Henry Dawkins. The result was an invitation to luncheon, from which counsel then excused himself. Walma Bowers and Henry were alone at Jast. Eventually Heory said, "You are the most wonderful woman in the world. I wish I could be with you forever."

"This is sudden," admitted Wilma,
"but I like it. I accept."

One week later they were married. Then began for Henry Dawkins a period of estatuic and thrill-filled days and nights. Wilms, the widow, was a tender and affectionate teacher of he bachelor pupl. But the familiar joy, of wedlock were of wholly secondary importance to Henry Dawkins. He secepted them only as a pleasant by product of a large blist. His was secret and solitary happaness, the thill off living close to dawer.

Not for one moment had Henry ever felt immself deceived about Wilma. He devoutly believed the whole attory at cold or the jusy by the district attorney. Now he first certain the would do to him what the did to her first husband. At last he wall do to him what the did to her first husband. At last he was living a real adventure! Thus he was not surprised when Wilmas suggested that he along the world of the

But once the policy, naming Wilms as sole beneficiary, without possibility of change, was delivered to him, life really became exciting. If Wilms baked an apple pie, Henry tasted it with eyes to one side, tongue poised, for the distant tang of an alien taste. He went curiously to sleep wondering if he would ever wake up.

Then came a winter's night, with the wind crying like a had child. The lamps were low in the Dawkins' living room, and Henry was in his easy chair

reading a deto

"My dear," he prinned, "that looks like brown October ale. You remember - the song in Robin Hood?" "Robin Hood?" repeated Wilma, aghast, "Did you say Robin Hood?" "Yes." said Henry, "Anything wrong about it?"

Wilma's hand, pouring the beer, began to tremble. "Robin Hood," she repeated, "I remember now," She rushed across the room toward umphant sourced and pulled out a paper fluttered to the floor. With a held it triumphantly before Henry's bug-eved stare. There it was, and no mistake. Her first husband's note, proclaiming his intention to commit sui-

Wilma was not a murderess. She The squib in yesterday's paper told how Henry Dawkins of the Bronx went to Reno and got his divorce.

NEXT MONTH . .

ELLERY OUEEN'S MYSTERY MAGAZINE will contain:

THE CLUE OF THE RED WIG by John Dickson Carr THE BODY IN GRANT'S TOMB by Cornell Woolrich A BOTTLE OF PERRIES by Edith Wharton THE FRANTICK RESEL by Lillian de la Torre

THE DAUPHIN'S DOLL by Ellery Queen CHEATING THE GALLOWS by Israel Zangwill

and other distinguished stories, both new and old, including a surprise "discovery."

CHALLENGE TO THE READER

In 1893 M. P. Shiel, that comparatively unusung genits of the need and the fantasite, had his first look published. The three short norther WAINCE SALESKI were a fund, throubout to Poe's Durjin vislogy which had first appeared in body from exactly half a century before. List, behowever, Shiel wearied of his eccentric sleuth and abundaned him — for precisely another half century.

And therein lies our tale . . .

It is not commonly human that in 1942 Mr. Shiel remed the changes of Prince Zalachy, a new red a found Tacky then throw operacially for EDMA, has trangely counted to be never a one on now of the spic centre EDMA, has trangely counted to be not consumed to the prince of the prince o

While we cannot bring you a new Prince Zaleshi story— and now that Mr. Shids it dead all those for the resurrection of Prince Zaleshi y gone— we can bring you as Shiel wavy which, according to the author himself, has never been published in the United States. It is a story, nonrower, that was written by Mr. Shiel in callaboration with his good friend John Gawwarth. It is a story, too, that weets Mr. Shiel's genius for the world and the foststatic, and we within the fromesour, which he betwied low drawing the fromesour, which he betwied low drawing.

of the man down of the state of the

of the modern detective story.

So, dear reader, hone thy logic — one of the great Old Masters is through the desired of the three story of the Old Poses is laying down the gauntlet. Whet thy utits, dear reader — one of the Old Poses is laying down the claes. And just before the etid, when Mr. Shiel says (through his character, Uncle Quantus) that he has "provided you with utilizent claus to solve the workform" on shall have a few more words to way -- by way of warning!

A CASE FOR DEDUCTION

by M. P. SHIEL and JOHN GAWSWORTH

Siece voo pride yourself on solving mysteries," sid my Uncle Ouistus, pulling from a perty piperte the amoke of some preparation of canadar's which had followed him facts in the case of a young artist friend of mine, Aubrey Smith, cough, I should think, for you to checidate and explain his troubles to me, without my telling you the successive of the contract of th

"Indeed, yes," I replied, and settled down into my fireside armchair to listen attentively and to make notes. "Well," pursued my Uncle

Well, pursued my Unce Quintus, 'Hat night when he was to recue two lives from—death, maybe, Aubrey Smith, as was his way on Wedresdays, spent the evening with his weetheart, Hydda, at Rose Villa, her home m Claphan. But from the moment when she opened the door to Aubrey that evening, Hydda had a feeling that this Wednesday was in some way special and different from the rest.

"'Quite a beauty,' she said of the bouquet which Auhrey handed her, but with a touch of reproach she said it, since Auhrey could ill afford such displays. Every Wednesday, it was true, he brought a bouquet, but this was a mass that must have cost ten shillings.

"She woodered why, and he knew that she woodered, there was such a sympathy between their natures, yet he offered no explanation; and she wondered why he was in black, with a black tie. . . . "Captain Hood himself — Hyldu's father — noticed it, as they sat to dinner, and made the remark, "Why, danner, and made the remark, "Why, Aubrey, you look as if you were in mourning tonight."

"But you know, sir," said Aubrey, 'that I am the last of the crew — I haven't a relative now to mourn for."

"But he said it with shy eyelids, and Hylda, to whose kea his soul was an open book, understood that this evening Aubrey, for some reason, was concealing something or other from "That startled her heart! There was the big bouquet, the black garh.

... What, then, was in the wind?
Her eyes, when he was looking at his plate, kept silently inquiring it of his

Her eyes, when he was looking at his plate, kept silently inquiring it of his face.

"Once when Captain Hood had limped his lamed key to his ingle-nook to muse there over his cheroot as

In afford such usual, Aubrey looked as if disposed sday, it was to tell something; Hylda by this time Copyright, 1947, by John Gaseconth had withdrawn her pampered Lupot it at her chin, Aubrey was accomconving her on the piano, and all down Rosehill Road faces were lookine out from the rows of oriels, as was usual on Wednesday evenings, to hear the music - for Hylda, the hope of the Royal College, could make her fiddle discourse strange sorrows. She and Aubrey had done the Sonata in F. and were about to give a Lied. when, in the interval, their hands met as they turned the leaves of the second book, their hands and their eyes, and Hykla smiled, and be smiled; and he began then to say, 'Hylda, perhaps I had better tell his nook called out, 'Aubrey, let me back: 'Quite so, sir,' and started to render it.

"After which for hours they wearied out the ear with sweetness, and through it all Hylda waited to hear, but Aubrey said nothing.

"Dear heart,' she whispered to ham at the door near eleven when be was going, againg up a moment on his

that I like's and Aubrey called breast into those girl-beguiling eyes of stubrey. 'God keep you.'

"He trooped to kiss ber.— a steepsish stoop, he was so high up compared with her—saying. We'll meet for luncheon tomorrow at the Circus,' and he went, he gazing after ham, he in the falling snow waving his hat back at her— the most oic-turesque old hat on this planet, in such an egregious tone of green, turned down over the nose, with Ars Studen and Latin Dustre written all over it — and he was gone from her. "He took train at Clapbam Junction for Victoria, and from Victoria was off afoot (to save "bus fare!) to his little flatlet in Madel Vale.

was off afoot (to save "bus fare!) to his little flatlet in Maida Vale. "It was during this tramp that he rescued the two lives. "In an albey behind the Edgware

"In an alloy behold the Edgesser Road is war, it has very sport, earlier in the night, a hungry ran, who had decired to go to proson, had hoelen a cliented to go to proson, had hoelen a passed, torod a cab and a harrow, blocking the way; at the sume moment is motor-car came round a country, and, its driver not apparently shakow, dashed on. Our of Aubrey's mouth a shout of warming broke; in the radiances of the moment he even additionally the direct at one had his hallow, and the former at one had his brakes on, Aubrey was knocked staggering, as the ear humped fully used.

"In a moment there stood with him an old man and a young lady from the car, the old man saying: 'My dear sirl are you hurt?'
"'Not a hit? Aubrey cried.

"Papa, this is you in the rôle of chauffeur,' the young lady remarked —in a queer species of whisper, busky, rapid, which, however (though the noise of the engine, running free, was in the ear), Aubrey could still hear.

"'Now, Laura? — the old man turned upon her to insist that he was an accomplished chauffeur, then requested that Aubrey must 20 home with him for a glass of whisky, rather confirming Auhrey's surmise that he was talking to an Irishman "'But, sir, really --- ' he began

"Yes, come,' Laura said to him in that same whispered way, and he gathered that her voice, owing to some affection of the vocal chords. was gone. " 'Yes, come.' There she stood, almost as tall as her tall father, draned in a pony-skin coat, its opening framing her face, 'Yes, come,' And now he went. " 'An adventure!' he said, as the three passed into a house in Brook Street: 'on my hirthday, 100' - this fact not having been mentioned to his sweetheart, Hylda Hood; and although he and Hylda had been engaged since they were thirteen, Hylda still remained ignorant what day his burthday was.

" 'Your hirthday?' from the old min, whose name had now turned out to be Sir Phinos O'Dowdy O'Donague: 'now, that's singular, I'll give you some whisky for it - come on!"

"Aubrey was brought into an apartment with silken walls and two brawling fires; and here, pointing to a picture, he said at once, 'Why, I saw that in last year's Academy." "'Ego pinze,' Laura said with a

" 'Awfully well done,' be breathed under it.

"'Praise from Raphael,' She currseved again. "'Who told you that I am an artist?' he asked.

"'I may be dumb,' she said, 'but I'm not blind,'

" 'You dumb?' be cried: 'not quite. I think!

"Her tongue flew as she sat stooped forward before him, her chin on her fists, flew in that breathy throatwhisper that went on as busily as a threshing-machine, or paddle-boxes threshing the sea; and he, listening with one car to ber and with the other to her father - for they fought against each other, speaking together in a race - thought that he had never lighted upon a pair of such live and hrilliant heings. Father and daughter tossed rains of reportee at each other. jeered at each other, desogired of each other, yet were evidently chums, Neither could sit still six minutes. Six Phipps jumped up to show the latest novel hy Bourget, Laura jumped up, humming, to dash her hand over the piano keys, to show a Welsh crowth, or a miniature of Coquelin, Before tweety minutes Aubrey was at home with them; and once - the whisky had then come, and Laura had run out for a moment - Sir Phipps furtively took from out of his breast pocket a photograph, and furtively gave Auhrey a glimpse of it - the photograph of a lady. "'Well, the old sinner!' was Aubrey's first thought; his second was: 'How perfect a beauty!'

thinking apparently that Aubrey would know the name; but Aubrey bad no notion who La Rosa was, "He wunted to take the photograph to feast his eyes on it; but now they could hear Laura's steps, and Sir Phipps hurriedly hid it. "After this for hours Aubrey could

After this for nours Authory could hardly find a chance to say 'Now I must go': if he did, it was at once drowned in talk, and he passed a merry aight, which was only marred by one awkward moment, when, during another absence of Laura, Sir Paipos hurriedly drew a check, and held it out to Aubrey.

"'My good sirl' Aubrey breathed with shy eyelids.

with say eyelids.

"'Tush!' Sir Phipps said, 'you are only a boy, and I an old fellow whose life you have saved — your birthday,

"'Yes, sir.' — from Aubrey, with a breath of laughter, 'but really — I am poly sorry that these thines can't

"'Oh, well, we won't quarrel over it'-Sir Phipps tore the check in "Mattery could here Big Pen strike ing three, as he retoped out into streets now powdery with snow, over whigh a the and waning moon had moved up, revealing him to Laura, who at a window peered after him till he disappeared. Laura at that window then clasped her hand; behind her neck, and stretched, and then, alone in the room, law sideways on a sofa, and mused. What a tall, rough-relaciblew the thought; his dash of dark mutache did not cover his rich lips, he had a modest way of lowering his eyelids, which was both hiy and dischainful; he threw out odd breaths of laughter; and under the eyelids, eyes all beauty, like the Mocalight Sonata, drowsy, brown, brown. She turned, and stretched, murmuring, "Yes, charming," with half a yawn, and half a laugh, and said 'Ah!'

"Aubrey, for his part, on getting home, sat up yet an hour smoking

came to the conclusion that he would go no more to the O'Donagues, Laura was a remarkable creature, he houghal So lively, vital—and the work of the conclusion of the conclusi

Ross wat more lovely thin Laura. But Hylda was good, bern good to the heart — was Laura good? Laura was glitter, Hylda was a nagel. Well, the burthday bas come, and the burthday has goor, he mummerd at last; and tossing off the mourning clothes, he turned in to bed.

"The next day at luncheon in their usual Piccadilly tea shop, on his relating the adventure to Hylda, she overwhelmed him with questions as to Laura - Laura's looks, Laura's throat-whisper, Laura's touch, and she was with him, she could not help it, she could see nothing but him alone; she hung only upon him, her 'did they seem really to want you again?'

"I think so,' Aubrey answered;

'but I'm not going, all the same."

" 'Hard to say quite why.' His eyes dropped from her face.

"But Aubrey was not to escape the baronet so easily, for only a week later that Rolls car which he had saved from a shock drew up before his block of flats, the O'Donague Aubrev stood all shy eyes at the honor, and brought forth liqueurs. The fact was, that the old baronet to whom to give peeps of Salvadora Rosa's photograph and make a confi-Aubrey: so that within a month or two now. Aubrey, without having ever set eyes on her, knew La Rosa by rote. She turned out to be a lady Spanish by birth, divorced wife of a

Polish Count; and what mainly made her potorious, apart from some duels daughter whom her ex-husband had ber: for this child, on attaining her eighteenth year, would be as rich as Crossus: so Salvadora Rosa, who seemed to have a keen sense of the good of money, stuck to the child though its father was its lawful guardian. At that moment, Sir Phinos ably no soul but Salvadora Rosa and her own agents bad any notion where ber; was the fact that she had a little

"'Must be a clever sort of lady,"

"'Clever as ten monkeys!' Sir

Phipps cried out.

" 'She is like a bank or the Severn - sometimes full, sometimes empty.' Sir Phines O'Dowdy O'Donague answered; 'it comes and it goes, like a maid's flushes and the monthly moon. hard up - embarrasée, her little tongue calls it, with a roll on the r.' "Take care she doesn't get what she wants from you, sir."

of a lady." " 'I ber pardon,' Aubrey said,

"But he seemed destined to have to hear of La Rosa; although be did not crush-reception, when he got only glimpses of Miss O'Donague) Brook Street came to him. One day, looking street he saw a gig roll slowly past, the reins in a lady's hand, and the lady was Laura O'Donague. He watched with interest to see if she glanced up at his windows, but she did not. However, one day some three months later he opened his door to a rap, and there, to his amazement, was the busy breath of Laura, whispering: 'I have to talk to you about Pana. It is

"It was all about La Rosa and ber Paga that she had come!

"You have a lot of influence over within the nook made by the half-round seat that surrounded Aubrey's fireplace: 'he never so took to anyone as to you; and you have to speak to

"Aubrey began to say: 'I'm rather afraid _____ "But the said: 'No, really, you don't know how serious it is: he is getting more and more entangled with this lady, and three days ago, just after getting home from her place, had a most strange illness. . . . "'Oh, I say, Miss O'Donague! "'You have no idea of this woman.'

Laura said - 'she sticks at nothing. I have never seen her, but one night last week, at the Mansion House, Detective-Sergeant Barker - ever heard of Barker? - impressed upon me that she's most dangerous, said that the woman's hungers are like a tiger's. and it is only because she is so much deeper than the European police that she can continue her career.' "Aubrey, with puckered brows, sat at a loss what to say, but in the end promised to use his 'influence with poor Papa,' and after an hour's windstorm of whispering, Miss O'Donague at last accused herself of being unconventional in coming alone, and left

"Two months later, in July, he spent a weekend with the O'Donagues at Clanning, their seat in Gloucestershire, and then, as they went to Italy, saw them no more for some months.

"It was autumn when the O'Donagues returned to England, passed a fortnight in Gloucestershire, and then were in London once more, La Rosa having also been abroad at the same time; and shortly after she was back, they were back

"Aubrey was at work one afternoon in November on a Kermesse, when the O'Donague anew came breezily in " 'I am now straight from Regent's Park [Recent's Park meant Salvadors

Rosal: got back from Italy three weeks ago, then went down to Clanning - beastly unpleasant thing happened down there - give me a glass of liqueur: I don't feel well today,

"What unpleasant thing, sir?" -Aubrey presented liqueur, "'Not seen it in the papers? Little girl of seven lost from the village vanished - I knew her quite well; little thing named Ada Price - blackhaired - Welsh - nice little thing

- child of one of my underkeepers -

the whole countryside searched, ev-of it all on me - Oh, I say, I feel bad, he? asked Laura quite calmly over

"Even as he sipped the liqueur Six to his car, the baronet was so tottery. However, Sir Phipps did not look mortally ill, and it was profoundly shocking when at nine o'clock that night Aubrey got a telegram: 'Papa died in the car on the way home from you, I wish to see you, Laura O'Donaguc '

"So he was gone, the gay, the bountiful old fellow, with his gray imperial him at the thought of the daughter who, he knew well, would be very deeply bereaved, and be hurried to

"He found her in the baronet's bedroom, however, quite her average self, chatty, agile, showing no sign that anything out of the common had happened. Only once, when she thought that he was not looking, he saw her shake her head at her father's portrait, and smile sorrowfully at it, chauffeur she already knew all the old man's movements that afternoon:

how he had passed from Regent's Park to Aubrey's me,' Aubrey told her, 'First he spoke of his doings since his arrival from Italy, then of an unpleasant thing happening down at Chaning, and then, saving be felt bad, asked

" 'He isn't lying there poisoned, is

"'Oh, I say, don't --- ' Aubrey breathed, shrinking. " 'Aubrey, this world isn't done all the baronet on his bed.

in water colors,' she said to him

"Aubrey's eyes dropped. Laura had called him 'Aubrey'! And even in the presence of that sternness on the bed, some nerve of him that ran down from his crown to his feet thrilled throughout, his brow rushing into brown with a blush

"That wild word 'poison,' however, was only that one time uttered, since there was nothing to suggest such a thing to any mind, and as Sir Phipps's physician had long been aware that the baronet was suffering from 'tobacco heart,' liable to sudden dilatation, the death certificate and verdict were in accordance "All during that funeral week Autually on three days of it he did not see Hylda at all "On returning from the grave-side, 'Now for some Hylda!' he sighed to first thing the next morning for him was yet a telegram from Laura in the "More death - I should like to see you.' "When he went to her it was to learn that an old person, knowe as Davenport, a butler, for over thirty years in the service of Sir Phipps, had from the funeral—a new wore which had the effect of throwing Laura O'Dowague into an extraordinary passon of magainh. At her falser's dath her self-control had been so complier as to appear even cold to everyone; but less careful, mybe, in his leser; east, et thu second strikes abe bruic out into torrest oil teas, green the transmission of the control of the control touched her hand, saying, 'Laura, I am surry,' she replicet 'Oh, my back is broad. Why did you come? What about this poor Davenport,' said Aubrey: 'At what hour — P "Oh, pray don't mention to me the name of Davenport,' said she;

"Aubrey wondered why he had been sent for, since she snapped at everything which he could find to say; and before jong left her alone to

"It was still too soon for him to go to the tea shop to Hylda, so he went home once more, and it was as he now opened his flat-door that he saw on the floor the note which was to play nine-pins with his whole life.

nine-pins with his whole life.
"It came from some attorneys, and it was a breathless Aubrey Smith whose eyes perused these lines:

" . . . have the pleasure to inform you . . . by the last will of the late Sir Phapps O'Dowdy O'Donague . . . you become the life-legatee of the sum of £175 per anoum . . . shall be pleased to see you at your convenience . . . Ife & Siemens.

"So good, so large, the old man! A good heart that wished one well! Aubrey's eyes sprang water, and then - he ran. Outside, he found walking too slaw now, a 'bus too slow, he sprang into a cab - for the tea shop. come, and now be paced impatiently about, counting the seconds, waiting for the appearance down Piccadilly of a neat figure with a winged toque on her head. Anyhow, all was well now, his way clear, Just that little sum each year, the difference it would makel ried. . . . For four years now, since she was seventeen, Hylda and he had been ever on the jump of being married, but always the same tiny trouble - no money to buy things with The old captain on his half-pay had mone. Aubrev's masterpieces had had no market. Now it was well

"I haven't really worked, you know, Hylda," he said to her in the tea shop that day: 'I see it now. I seem to be the laziest beggar going, somehow. But won't I work now?"
"Dear, you have worked hard,' she answered, 'and this is your well-earned reward."

"'But, Hylda, tell' me frankly,' Aubrey said, 'is it not a fact that we can be married straight away?"

why not,' Hylda answered: 'you know that I can usually win Papa,"

"Then, let's take a balf-holiday and go now straight down to Clapham. . .

"'Really so eager for me?' she asked gravely.

"'Eager is hardly the word: I'm afraid I am a little off my our. " 'All right, let's go, then. . . . ' "It was soon settled: for though

Captain Hood, who was of an unmodern school, would not hear of the Registry Office, but must have a church wedding, be agreed that the banns should be given in immediarely. "And now came busy days for Aubrev Smith, His den was too small to take Hylda into, so that had to be changed; and since they were an artist pair, no ordinary purchases would do for the furnishing of that home: stern were Aubrey's exclusions of this and that, delicate his selections, not of the dearest, nor even of the best, but of the best for his idea and dream; and all this needed time. At night he would come home worn out, lacked the time to call on the attorneys, as he had been asked to, forgot Laura O'Donague's existence. and of the small sum in his bank spent every penny on the strength of his fresh wealth. "Once only - one forenoon - he saw Laura for a moment close to Hyde Park Corner, she all mourning black in her ear; and she stopped to besiege Aubrev's ear with her busy breath-whispering, asking, 'Have you " 'What?' he asked " About the woman ! " Which woman? " 'Why, La Rosa.'

" 'No, not heard.'

"'Not one penny does she touch! Papa has left ber thirty thousand pounds on a life-policy - that's why she poisoned him. . . .

"'Oh, Laura, really you are not to say such things even in fun." "'Not one penny does she touch, though! I mean to fight it in every possible way -- "undue influence" --

When are you coming? " Soon " 'I don't want you.'

" 'Then I won't come.' " 'Yes, do. Goodbye --- 'She was

"It was on that same night, five days before his wedding day, that Aubrey found awaiting him at home vet another letter from the lawvers. this one stating that, as his legacy was, by the terms of the will, to be paid on his birthday, the firm would he old if he would send them a certificate of birth "Having read it. Aubrey sat down. and with his brow on his hand stared there at the floor without a motion for an hour; and though no moun broke from him, his bead hung low, like a man who has received a grievous blow, upon whom gloom and ruin

"It would have been far better, he thought, then, if he had never met that motor-car that night of this lattice, day, and many times he asked simuelt with torture why he had ever men-toned to Sir Phipps that that was his birthday, for it was clear that the baronet's idea in thus drawing the will was to remind him through life of the recue he had effected that night and Aubrey burief his head, shaking if from side to ide, asking it from side to ide, asking the first him that the way to rell Hylda had been also as the same and Hylda had been as the same and Hylda had been as the same and Hylda had been as the same and the same as the singer and vacery started no lock, shaking it from set to nide, adding the high properties of the set of the started properties of the set of the three could not, after all, marry how the was to make for understand that it was no mere delay that had arisen, but a permanent matter—unless be was to reveal to her now a thing, and oft nice did not a newny, a strange and ominous date, which he had so far very artfully contraved to hade from her hea. How tell her this now? Her worstand the set of the set of the worstand that the set of the condense strates of furniture that were waiting for convenience.

"But on a sudden he started, he was up, with the cry, 'South'!." "There was more than one Aubrey Smith in the world!

"However, he hesitated a little, scratched his foetlead, with a puckered note, asking himself 'Would it be quite pretty?' But the relief, the gaiety, revealed in his grimace, proved that his mind had really decided, whatever scruples might come between; and suddenly he had suttend his but, and was away with

"In a cab he drove to a dreary bystreet near Russell Square, to a boarding house in it, where in answer to his query if Mr. Aubeey Smith was in, a girl answered him: 'I think he is—right at the top, the door facing the tains'; and with careful footstep. Aubeey climbed through a darlores that had a fasty odor, high up, till he swe light through a keyhole, tapped at the door, and now a man in a rather ranged drassinggoon appeared.

peering, demanding, Who is it?"
"Your namesake, Smith."

'My dear fellow, come in "— be bent cordially over Aubrey's hand; however, he suddenly added, 'Watt a moment,' turned back inwards, was heard whispering to someone, and it was two minutes before he returned to let Aubrey in.

"This Aubrey Smith the Second was a man of fifty, handsome, with some judges call 'fascinating' (he had been schooled, and had lived, mainly abroad); a military mustache, a ducal carriage; and here was a man of contrasts - cousin of a pobleman, had hobaobbed with princes, living now in a den with holes in the carpet and a broken respot on the bob. What that head of his did not know of this world was not worth knowing; and who could converse of it more charmingly? Yet there he was, aging and a failure. He had had a career! Had been frozen out of the British-Indian army, had sung in Italian Opera at La Scala, had been forbidden evermore to show his nose in Monte Carlo.

"'My dear fellow! Smith cried,
'you are the very man, for I have now in the coolest five thousand each without fail.' "Aubrey laughed, for many were Smith's schemes, and now he was about to do something astounding in wines, now to sell a mine, to huy a public-house, or build flats; but nothing ever happened; so Auhrey said I, too, have a scheme.

"Instantly Smith was gravity itself; a look of eagerness and husiness rushed to those old eyes that had seen so much: but at that moment, before Aubrey could say more, a girl of and was about to hundle her back out of sight, when Aubrey said, 'This your lettle girl, Smith? I'm sure I didn't know that you had a child." "'A prighbor's child' -- from

" Isn't she a little beauty." "'Come, come, young lady, into the next room!" Smith now said in "Alors, tu es française, made child replied, with quite a nice how of the bead, and, catching up a doll out of the fender, she ran away back in.

" 'Look here, it's like this, Smith,' Aubrey now said, sitting on a shaky chair before Smith on the bed, 'I have just been left a legacy ----

" '() ho-o-of' Smith cried with pantommic eyes and a round mouth, 'that's talking! My dear fellow.' "

"'Smith, when is your birthday Aubrey asked suddenly "'Birthday? Three days' time the twenty-fifth ---- '

" 'Good!' Auhrey hreathed: 'I thought I remembered hearing you say that it is in November, Well, as this legacy of mine - it isn't much.

one hundred and seventy-five pounds a year - is to be paid on my birthdays, you have to get your birth certificate, and go and take the money for me, as if you were L'

" 'But stay -- I don't quite see what's what, Smith said. 'Why am I to assume your personality in this hard up, and my hirthday comes "'No, of course,' Auhrey shyly replied: 'It isn't that: I wish it was merely that; it is something much deeper.' "'O-ho-o-ol' Smith cried aloud

" 'So, then, you will, Smith.'

"'My dear chap, I'm your man." you ten per cent. " 'Not one little soul' Smith cried:

it would be odd if I couldn't do you a service of that sort without asking to be tipped. You need merely hand me expenses. . . .

Smith all the facts of the case, also third might thence, Smith undertak five pounds with him: and Aubrey went away light of heart.

"But at seven on the third night thence no Smith turned up; and after fright sprang up in Aubrey's heart; and he flew to Bloomsbury to see

"He was told at Smith's boarding house that Smith had gone away; and no one was aware where Smith had

"The next morning - the morning before his wedding day -- Aubrey eathered from a clerk in the outer office at Ife and Siemens, the atduly presented himself and got the hundred and seventy-five pounds of Sir Phipos O'Dowdy O'Donague's legacy; and feeling too unwell to face Hykla just then, longing only for went home to his new flat.

"It was about two hours afterwards him there; on the landing outside his flat door was a man erouching with his ear at the keyhole, listening patiently, with a grimace of eagerness footed down the three flights of stairs to the street door, where he whistled. "He bas the child at this moment in his flat!" the first man, whose name was Barker, whispered to the second, child, for though I couldn't hear child say. Now that I am seven years of age -"'Let's pounce upon him sharp!"

Upon which the two men, running up, pressed Aubrey's electric bell. "Aubrey did not answer it at once, and Barker, his ear at the keyhole, could clearly hear a sourcy and whispering within: fully two minutes passed, and then Aubrey appeared. "Your name, I think, is Mr. Aubrey Smith?" Barker asked.

"'We may mention that we are police officers. Are you living alone in this flat, may I ask?

"'You haven't a child of seven now with you, for example?"

" 'No, I'm not married.' "There are more ways of having a child of seven than by being married. We should like to look through

" 'My good sir, what is it all about?

" 'Listen, sir,' Backer said, 'we have with us no warrant to force a search; but, take my tip, it will be better for cent or suilty.

" 'You are believed to have in your custody the child Ada Price, abducted from the village of Clanning, Gloucestershire, on the ard instant. You were seen talking to the child on a "TP Aubrey cried, with a breath of laughter. "Look here, quick, is it yes or no?"

"'Well, if you insist, you can sarch, since that will comfort you,' Aubrey now said; 'but do get it over, officers.'

"The men, now coming in, went first into the newly-furnished drawing-room, and were looking round it when Aubrey did what certainly appeared a supicipout thing — ran down the hall passage, and turned the door key of his new studio. The officers, pecping, of course saw what he did and when, after looking through the other rooms, they came near to the studies of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of the court of the court of the court of the studies of the court of

"'Not in there,' he whispered to them with sby eyes.

"'How is that?' Barker wished to know.

"'Oh. I say, don't raise your voice,' he whispered, blushing; 'there's someone in there.'

"'We are well aware of that: let's have a look at her'—now Barker pounded upon the door. "My good sir, will you be so good as to go to the devil," Aubrey now said in an agonized low tone. 'Come, go out of my flat.'

"The detective scribbled something in his notebook, and without any in his notebook, and without any other word the two turned, went away.

"They did not, however, go far —

"They did not, however, go far one of them, at least — for when Aubrey went out afterwards to go down to Hylda's, he saw that he was

ing-room table was aglitter with wedding gifts, for many were the girl friends of Hylda, many were coming to the wedding, and bright that day were Hylda's eyes to the moment when she opened the door to Aubrey, but instantly now, though he put on his bravest looks, her face clouded. "'All not well?' she asked him watched, and understood that be would soon hear from them anew.

"Down there at Clapham the din-presently, with a look.

"He could not utterly kill his bride's brightness, and replied: "Why

"The text morning, his wedding day, he discovered that all his wealth was seventeer-and sixpence; and having with the sixpence sent a 'good morning' telegram to Hylda, at a loss now how to spend the time till our o'clock, he took his gun and weat down to Grange House, a friend's place in Surrey, where there was some shootine, thinking that he would at row a five-pound note. He came back rather in a haste, a little late, with a hate and a rabbit, but without the five-pound note, since his friend was away from home, and three at a time he stormed up the flights of stairs to one. On the other hand, the church was hardly three hundred yards away up the street, so that he had no up the first that he had no journey to make.

"At three minutes to one Hylda's bridesmaids were there, ready, waiting in the church porch for her; a knot of people, and a policeman, stood in the street to see; inside, the organist, a personal friend of Hylda's, was amusing his fingers with the tune of O Perfect Love: the clergyman stood ready. As the church clock struck one. a carnage bearing the bride, all in beliotrope soile with white orchids, bearing also the bride's father, drove round a corner; and one minute afterwards Aubrey, a late and troubled out upon the pavement. above him a girl-child, looking out, cried gleefully aloud in French to some person behind her: 'O, monthis, the person popped his head out,

Hylda, at the moment, was being handed out of her carriage, but her stood besitant, one foot on the carriage step, in wonderment at what she

"For, as the child cried 'O, monsieur, look!' Hylda saw that Aubrey heard and glanced up, and as the man above popped out his head, she saw that Aubrey saw him, although the man instantly pulled himself back; in his career toward the church, he

"She was so amazed that there, silence what the next instant would bring with it; till in about two minutes, or less, the sound of a gun-shot rang out of the house; from the wina cloud of smoke was seen to drift: and now the policeman in the crowd began running. . . .

'He had not, however, run halfway to the house, when out of it darted a dark-haired child, howling, washed in blood, staring, staggering; ten yards from the building she dropped to the ground and lay silent; and as the policeman approached her, out of coat bellving behind him - nelting. both of them, with white, wild faces, the man flying. Aubrey chasing away from the church; and without delay, leaving the wounded girl on the ground, the policeman, too, blowing his whistle, was pursuing the two, and a fourth man, who had been watching the place on Detective-Sergeant Barker's behalf, joined in, "The two, however, in their agony of eagerness, easily distanced the two policemen.

At the same moment, Hylda felt her senses almost fail her, and in a half on the carriage step, halt on the street, breathing hard in a rather queer way. . . .

"It was nearly two weeks after than distracted wedding day of hers, when, one morning. Hylda Hood presented herself before Laura in Brook Street.

"'I do hope I don't come too early --- 'Hykla began. "Not even a little. Sit down. I am glad - I am very glad - that you have come. Do you know. I know you quite well - for years, it seems - I could have drawn your face just from Aubrey's chatter of you, and here you are exactly as I conceived you. Only - in black, Why in black?

"Hylda, looking downwards, after a momeot said: 'My father was buried yesterday, Miss O'Donague."

" 'Oh! poor -- ' Laura breathed, shrinking, then io an impulse ran and " 'He had not been strong for some time,' Hylda remarked, 'and what has I should have come to you before, but have been ill myself; now I feel called upon to make some sort of effort to confront all this mystery, though I'm afraid ----

" Oh, courage, we shall win to the surface yet,' said Laura, 'Seek and you shall find: I believe in that. I take it that you have not heard from poor

" 'No,' - low in tone. "'Why? Why?' Laura asked of "'There can be only two reasons,"

Hylda said: 'either he is no longer alive, or he is in some situation in which he finds it impossible to write." " 'But what kind of situation can that be? Perhaps he is conscious of having done something wrong, and shrinks from writing ----

"'He?' - from Hylda with raised evebrows; then she smiled, saving, Excuse me, I am always assuming certainty as I do.' "But how can you say not, in that undoubting way, Miss Hood? Of the two guns found together in the other man's flat one was Aubrey's, and the gunshots found in the child's throat fit Aubrey's gun, not the other man's: so Detective-Sergeant Barker was telling me ----' "How can he know which of the two is Aubrev's gun?' Hykla asked. " 'Aubrey's initials are on it?'

" 'Still, Aubrey would hardly have taken up a loaded gun for any reason. . . . It may be that the other man's initials are the same as Aubrey's ----

" 'It may be, of course "'And as to this other man." Hylda asked, 'no trace of him yet?" " 'None!' Laura spun round with a laugh, 'he has disappeared from the face of creation as completely as Aubrey has. It strikes me that the pair of them have been up to something, so both are in hiding. "'Aubrey would not hide, I assure you, Miss O'Donague,' replied Hylda. "Laura, looking contemplatively at her, remarked: 'Do you know, I think we are going to be friends?" " 'We won't be foes?' asked Hylda. "'Let's hope oot. I am a ripping good hater." "'And I am a good lover - if I thing that you know?" "Laura, now sitting by Hykla's ade, sold how 'the other man' who had vanished with Aubrey round that street corner had taken the flat in Aubrey's block of buildings only two moved into it without waiting to have the flat repapered. He had taken it in the name of 'Hamilton Iones,' but it had been ascertained by the police that this was not really his name, 'Iones' had bought his furniture in Tottenham Court Road only the day before he moved into his new abode, an abode whose hall door happened to face Aubrev's; and whether this lones' had taken that flat knowing that Aubrey was there, or just by chance, or what was the nature of the relation between him and Aubrey, remained all a mystery. As to the wounded child, she was a little maid - foreign, it was believed, since command all a mystery. As to the wounded child, the was a luttle made wounded child, the was a luttle made of the control of the control of the dark, and since the wore a diamond medallion of the Madonna about her thorat and as her contines was found to be lumarous in the extreme, it was doubted if the really belonged to the Hamtheon fonce, whose furniture that the control of the control of the Add's litter, only a brit in this said. She was then lying in St. George's Beppital, had not yet spoden, but would recover; and Laura had thrice been to see her.

"To all which Hylda listened with her eyes on the floor, and then a sigh rose from the depths of her; her pretty, broad face looked rather drawn and pale; and Laura, sitting by her whitered. "'Den't be too sad; was, I if and him for you; it will be all right; and she took a hand of Hyldt's, swigs, What fowable hands you have, Mis Hood — Hylds! There warm little moral hands, imperfect and dear! an among to kits this left one near the hear? — the kissed it, mourang, 'Don't grieve, don't grieve, my hearts' bleeds for you'; and plaving with the hand; while Hylds smiled at her, she saked. What are these dents in the flesh of the first and second fingers?

— Funny. . . . '

"They are due to years of intervalstopping on the violin," Hylds said.
"Of course, that's it. I have leard that you are a virtuoso, and I demand to hear you soon. Are you still at the College?"
"Nominally; but all that's over

"'Nominally; but all that's over for me now, I'm afraid."

"'But why?'

"'My father had no money to have to earn my living."

"Up started Laura at this, dancing,

"Up started Laura at this, dancing, clapping her palms, crying, 'Oh, how jolly!"
"Hardly for me,' said Hylda.
"Yor me, yes,' cried Laura, For that means you living with mel Do you know, I dreamed it? Yes, one night: and here it is, come to pass. Why, I want a companion! I have actually been inquiring—actually been inquiring — '

''Miss O'Donague, you are very r good — '

"'Call me Laura this instant!'
"Hylda looked at her with dimples in her smile, but said nothing.

"Why, how jolly!" cried Laura; just think, always to be together now, and we'll talk of Aubrey all day, and be good to each other, and bear with each other, and read each other's letters, and go incognite on sprees to Venice on our own, and down to Clanning—did Aubrey tell you about Clanning?

"He told me," said Hylda, 'and of that child lost down there. By the way, he had a most ludicross story to tell me on the day before our wedding day about two men going to his far and as good as charging him with having stolen the child. Has she been found, do you know?"

"'! think not."
"'Aubrey said that the two men entered his flat and searched all through ——'

"Ah?' said Laura, smiling to herself with downcast eyes,
"'Yes, and insisted that they had actually heard the child speaking in the flat."

"Oh? . . . Poor old Aubrey! he

"'Oh?' . . . Poor old Aubrey! he was in for it those few days, wasn't he?'
"'Haven't you heard anything of this incident before?"

"Well, yes, I think I heard something of it from — Barker, and Laura, jumped up anew from the sofi, opened a book on a table, looked at it.

humming, cast it saide.

"She doesn't invariably utter everything that she is thinking," thought Hyldn; and she added aloud:
To what could such a delusion of these offices have been due?"

"Laura pouted, asking: 'How can you be sure that it was a delusion?'
"Because there was no one at all in Aubrey's flat, so no one could have been beard in it!"
"I see, But since Detective-

Sergeant Barker vows that he heard the child with his own ears in the flat, what answer can be made to that? Maybe Aubrey saw the child down at Clanning, fell in love with her, for Maybe Aubrey saw the child down at Clanning, fell in love with her, for she was very pretty, and — nicked her."

"Miss O'Donague," said Hylda

very gravely, 'we seem to disagree on the subject of Aubrey; so perhaps we had better not talk much of him.' "'Meaning that I am in love.'

"'Did I imply that?'
"'You exhaled it. But when did Aubrey tell you about his little legacy?
When did he say he was going to which did he say he was going to draw it?"

"He told me on the fourth day before the wedding day that he meant to draw it in two days' time." answered Hylda.

"'So his birthday was two days before the wedding day?"

"Birthday? What has his birthday to do with it?"
"So you don't know — he never a rold you — that the legacy was to be paid on his birthday?"

"'I — no — you must be mistaken
— he never mentioned it."
"Hylch's eyes were so large with scare and amazement, that Laura leaped up laughing and could not help saying. What, are there things which Aubrey kept dark from you? "Hylda was dumb; spoke only with "There, now I have wounded you,' suc Laura rucfully, darting suddenly anew to her, 'because I am un ungenerous mean beast who kicks when one is down. . . . He forgot to mention it to you, that's all. You are so sensitive, so finely strung, and to bruise you is like trampling brutally upon a lute that breathes music to every breeze. . . . But, dear, it is so: he was to be paid on his birthdays, it was papa's whim. When is his birth-

"'1 - don't happen to know,' said Hylda in a maze; 'it must have been two days before the wedding day, since he said he was going to draw the

"'No, it wasn't, then,' said Laura decisively: 'for the wedding day was in November, but it was not in November that he rescued Papa in the car: and that day was his birthday. It was, if I remember right, an evening

"He said that that night was his

"'Ave - told papa." "Then, that was why he brought me that specially large bouquet that Wednesday night, But why, why was he in black?' Hylda wondered. "Laura, whirling a sald breloque about her forefinger, murmured, 'It is curious that he never told you, or that you never asked him, as to his birth-"Hylda said, 'I have always had an instinct of anything which Aubrey him that - not directly, that is; twice indirectly I have: but he never "But now, before she could say more, a footman, looking in, announced Detective-Screeant Barker.

" 'Don't go,' Laura said to Hylda, Barker and I are pals - he says the Force missed something when I was born a woman.'

"Barker came in - a man who, though his grade in the police was not addressed to 'Barker, London' - nr to 'Rob Roy,' his name among the naming him 'Old Moore,' Tallish. forty, agile, he had an agreeable smale beneath his mustache, and a wary gaze out of the tail of his eye, His teeth seemed excellent, but three in front were false, to replace the three in a Soho club-raid. Since he had had occasion, some months before, to warn Laura with regard to ber father's intimacy with the notorious Salvadora Rosa, or La Rosa, he had seen her several times in respect to various phases of the same matter; and she. fascinated by the extraordinary existence which this man lived, had sat chin on fist to hearken to historics of his hundred and one disguises as cab-driver, or street-artist, or weakminded eurate, of the clicking of the

'snips' on the wrists of the Dresden beard the child, and knew who it was."

bank-robbers, the Frameley forgers, famous 'receivers,' crib-crackers, of kind deeds done among those beasts of society, and tiger-struggles on the stairs of benighted lairs. In he now came, bowing, hat in hand, and Laura in her frank way gave him her hand, saw him scated, saving: "'You already know Miss Hood of the vanished bridegroom, Sergrant Barker?" "'I have that honor,' says Barker. "'We were just talking,' Laura remarked, hand on hip, with her saucy air, her dark hair parted at the side - 'this lady derides the idea that you heard anyone in Mr. Aubrey Smith's flat that day when, as you affirm, you heard the child in it." "'A lady is invariably right,' the detective admitted " 'What did you hear the child say, if one may ask?' Hylda demanded, paying no attention to his politeness. " 'Surely you may ask, Miss Hood. There was little to be heard, you understand, with a thick door between, but I distinctly heard a child utter the words: "Now that I am seven years of eye," As to that, I give you my

"How miraculous this thing!" Hylda murmured, 'There was no one in the flat!" " 'Mr. Aubrev Smith told you that, did he?" Barker asked, "'He told me of the incident, and did not tell me that there was anyone." "'Negative evidence,' Barker laughed. To me, now, he admitted that there was someone in the flat

" 'Lady,' Hylda breathed. "'You see now, Hylda' - from Laura: 'a detective, like a ludy, is invariably right, except when a detective and a lady differ, and then both are sure to be wrong, " 'Did he - actually say that there was a lady?' Hylda asked.

"'No, said the detective, but he looked, or tried to look, shy when we came to the locked door --- '

"'Locked door?' Hylda's ever dropped. "Ah, the incident of the locked door was never told you. I see,' said Barker; 'but it is well, Miss Hood, for us all to know what's what. I was allowed to look all through the flat, you see; but when it came to that locked room --- ah, that was another affair; and it was "there's someone in there" in a whisper, with shy looks." "Laura, standing against a cabinet with her arms spread out like one crucified, and her head thrown back. looked down upon Hylda, contentplating her suffering: while Hykla. now quite saunt, looked at the carnet. "'Never mind, dear,' said Laura;

'there's some explanation." "Suddenly Hylda flushed, and looking up with a smile, her eyes bravely met Laura's, as she said: 'I know that, Miss O'Donague': then, turning to Barker, she asked: 'And you seriously believe, Sergeant Barker, that it was the lost child from Clanning that Mr. Smith had in that

"Laura stood pale, then darting three steps at him with a face of

"Then, what do you say has become of this child?" " 'Ah, there now you ask one of the most difficult questions of all in this extraordinary matter,' said Barker, The house, of course, was closely watched from that moment, and be never brought out the child - that we know; our is the child now in the huilding: vanished is the word flat is the same child whom he shot:

but, then, the shot child is foreign, . . . By the way, that's one of the questions I have to ask you now. Miss O'Donague: you know little Ada Price, and you have seen the wounded child in hospital: do you not see a

"'It did not strike me,' Laura ceplied. "'Kindly look at little Ada's

photo,' said Barker, producing it, and Laura, looking at it, now said: Yes, I do rather see it now; only the " 'Still, you notice that they are slike. . . . And now, Miss O'Donague, I must next say to you what will be greatly against the grain.

"'Oh?' said Laura, 'My grain or " 'Both our grains.' .

" 'Ah, they both run the same way.

But I am dying to hear ----"Well, the Home Office has issucd an order for the exhumation of wrath, 'You wouldn't darel' she "'Now, do not take it to heart," Detective-Screeant Barker said gently. 'If it could be avoided, it wouldn't be done. But in the circumstances ----" 'What circumstances, pray, Ser-

"'Why, I have heard you hint yourself that he was poisoned!'

"'I was not in the least serious," Laura answered: 'a natural death! So why is this outrage perpetrated?"

"'No. don't take it to heartthink of the circumstances: your father dies suddenly on the way home from Mr. Auhrey Smith's, where, as you yourself have told me, he had had something to drink; to Mr. Smith's he had good from Madame Rosa's: to both Mr. Smith and to

by his death. "'Oh, my poor Papal' Laura avail to change the process of the Government machine, and within some days, by the time Hylda's household effects had been sold, and Hylda herself was a part of Laura's household, the disinterred coffin of

"Never, maybe, did the eyes of men light on a wilder sight than those eves that day, on a more woeful, on a more bewildering. They refused to believe their five wits! That sight seemed to be an evil dream that one feels to be a dream "1. The baronet's throat was most brutally butchered right into the inner carotids, with gashes jagged as by some blunt cutter. "2. His mouth was crowded full of some substance resembling powdered "3. In his stomach was discovered enough prussic acid to kill thirty "There," concluded my Uncle Quintus, "I have now given you hy my method of narration far more information than Detective-Sergeant Barker had to go on at this point in the mystery. Indeed, I have provided problem, if you have the aptitude that you claim for such work. Tell me now, before we go up to bed, what do you make of these strange affairs?" It was a wild night, rags of gusts commented the tapestries, the flicker only of the fire lighted us. My uncle and prepared to answer this formidable query. "Uncle Ouintus," I said, "as I see it. there are nine questions that need answering. If in each instance I surmise right, I should reach the same conclusion - the successful conclusion that you tell me DetectiveSergeant Barker arrived at, Let me. first of all, read you my questions. I will then attempt to answer them. "(t) What is the mystery of that 'strange and ominous date,' Aubrey

Smith the First's birthday? "(a) Who stole the black-haired seven-year-old, Welsh, Ada Price

"(3) Was the O'Donague poisoned

"(4) Is any significance to be attached to the death of Davenport. the butler?

"(5) Who is the black-haired, sevenyear-old, French-speaking little girl found living with Aubrey Smith the Second in the squaled by-street near "(6) Who uttered the phrase 'Now that I am seven years of age' from black-haired, seven-year-old, Frenchspeaking little girl? "(8) What happened to the two Aubrey Smiths subsequent to their

"(o) What is the explanation of the atrocities revealed by the exhuma-tion of the O'Donague?" EDITOR'S NOTE: Why don't you too accept Uncle Quintus's challenge? Can vou deduce, determine - or, ves, divine

- the answers to the nepheso's nine perceive through sympathy or intuition - and that is perhaps what you will have to do to see all the truth behind Mr. Shuf's riddle. For remember that M. P. Sixel, that wonderful man, was unique: his "cases for deduction" were never cut-and-dried affairs, susceptible wholly to theer and unadulterated looic. He always permated a margin for imagina-tion. As we once wrote of Mr. Shiel's work, he created a kind of rich and redolent romanticism; a kind of bizarre bravado, full of flamboyant and fantastic felony, wild and wilful wiliness. Take all this into account: allow for Shielesaue thenanivans, both in the use of the Envish language and in the conception of ideas. Only thus can you match wits with that strange man and savor his stories to the deep . . .

"Now, Uncle, if you will permit, I will expound. If it will not irritate you, I will tabulate my answers in just the same manner as I have tabu-

"These are my surmises. You can tell me, when I have done, exactly where I have gone astray. "(r) Aubrey Smith the First was born on the 29th of Pebruary in Leap Year, and so only had a birthday every four years, which explains his despair over his legacy (since £175 every fourth year would not be sufficient to marry on) and his appeal that his namesake him. On that four-year birthday be wore mourning - perhaps because his hirth had cost his mother her life? "(a) Count Poldoff's emissaries stole Ada Price, since they had reason they were scarching for. Once the opportunity presented itself, they intended substituting their prisoner for the Count's daughter.

"(3) The O'Donague was not poisoned when, to all appearance, he died dead! - was buried alive in a coma! "(4) The death of Davenport, the butler, was a natural one; but there was a significance, I suspect, attached to it, a significance which I will explain in answering my last question.

"(s) The black-haired, seven-yearold, French-speaking little girl living in squalor with Aubrey the Second was Count Poldoff's daughter. Brought for some years, no doubt, she had been educated and brought up as French in some obscure convent, she was entrusted by her mother to her agent, Aubrey Smith the Second. You will remember that La Rosa was abroad at the same time as the O'Donagues were in Italy; it was then, I think, that the child came to England. The fact that her mother was linancially embarassée explains the squalor, too, of

"(6) Aubrev Smith the First uttered 'Now that I am seven years of age' in his new flat - uttered it to Laura, who, in her unconventional way, was visiting him. He had let her know that his birthday was the 20th of Fehruary, and he meant by 'now

"(7) Aubrey Smith the Second stairs to take it, to intimulate his betraver. The child, no doubt, got shot in some scuffle between the two. to Aubrey Smith the Second, being

"(8) Aubrey Smith the Second flying before Aubrey Smith the First made for Regent's Park and La Rosa. pursuer, coming upon him, was seized and imprisoned by man-servants of the O'Donague were self-inflicted. Davenport the butler had placed in of the butler's death is that when the exhumation took place he was not there to explain. Sir Phipps, I fancy, alive in a coma, and so have made his okl servant swear that whenever he was being huried, he, the hutler, would put poison in the coffin. Sir drank the potson. In his agony he teeth, and cut his throat with the found a statement among the butler's papers to the effect that the butler placed the poison there. "I think, Uncle, that these are the facts, which the police must have discovered. Hylda, I suppose, married her Aubrey the First wheo, on La vnung man was released. Count Poldoff recovered his daughter from My Uncle Quintus looked at me approvingly. "My boy," he said highly -- "you are right in nearly everything; I am pleased to note that you have the family brain. And now to bed. A cuneiform stele's due from your views on that,"

DR. ALEXANDER O. GETTLER, REAL-LIFE DETECTIVE

by EDWARD D. RADIN

PRIME LABORATORY of Dr. Alexander O. Gettler, city toxicologist, is a huge mon which looks like something a surrealist designed after a bad night. Green and vellow bottles bubble over Bunsen burners. The fluid in a beaker turns blue and then red. Human bones that glow in the dark decorate a wall panel. Nearby is a Ruth Sayder hoped to eliminate her paramour, Judd Gray, after he had beloed her murder her busband. Strange death weapons form a neat pattern in a glass case. All of these are reminders of the part Dr. Gettler, a short, stocky man, has played in prominent murder cases in New York

Giv.

To most New Yorkers Dr. Gettler is simply a name that pops up in the messages of the growth of the population with the notation that wild angum have here set to also the growth of the population with the notation that wild angum have here set to also the gip int what that means or just what Dr. Cettler does Few people have ever seen him; he never goes to the severe of a critical and his courtroom appearances are rare. Yet Dr. Cettler is once of the world's generate dever, chair than any other one person in the crty.

Dr. Gettler performed one of his greatest feats when he broke the Alisi of the 32 Dancing Beauties. For months it appeared to be the perfect crime. Police thought they knew the killer but were unable to prove their case. Dr. Gettler solved the murder with a few grains of sand and seed.

It was on Monday morning. November 2, 1921, when the body of a dim, attractive branctive us found in a shallow disch in Central Park, in a section of the discharge of the control of the section of the discharge of the control of the beautiful of the discharge of the control of the violence on the body and it looked as if the woman had saidenly dropped clear and alfam not the click. Here are control of the control of the control of the control polish on her nails want chapped, an autoper version (Inverve that the gight. The detected instructive that the gight had been stranged Soundry sight. The detected mandrers that of the windpape, cassing the gift to look consciousness quickly and with

After a delay the victim was identified by her father as Mrs. Louisa Almadovar, 23. The father told police that she was estranged from her husband, Anibal (Terry) Almadovar. Louisa had left honie late Sunday afternoon after receiving a telephone call. She dressed with great care, told her parents that she was going out on a dinner date, and laughed saide all questions as to whom she was meeting. Her father walked with her to the subway station. That was the list time she was seen alive by any wit-since not was seen alone of any warment police were able to Sactacommon police were able to Sactacommon police and the sacta popular figure in the Spanish quarter of Hadem. A slight, dapper youth, he was an excellent dancer and the uncrowed rumbs leing of the dance-hall set. Women pursued him. He had maried Louis after a braf courrhaip and results of the sacta policy and the Police wondered for he ald been jetoused har for going out on a date and had mundered her. They some lexued that it was the other way around. Lenus had been person of hum-

friends only several weeks before the was killed. The two women weer raunded up and police tried the old trick of petting one against the other in the common several petting one against the other in the common several petting of the several petting of the several petting the several pe

An Army sergeant who had been pestering Louisa for dates was picked up for questioning. He was visibly nervous as the officers hammered questions at him, but the reason for this was soon evident. He was a draft evader, wearing a stolen uniform.

Almadovar fast called on his wife coly once after their veparation and this was to warn her not to bather big if frends. His father-in-iaw had ordered him out of the bouse. The dapper dancer, however, had the best alisi of any of the suspects. Although he had been in a dance hall not far from the park the night of the muser, as girls such he had danced with them that hight. This accounted for every single dance covering the time every single dance covering the time.

Attempts to shake the stories of the girls proved futile. Police found them-selves engulied in blondes, brunettes, and redheads, all above average in looks and figure. Because there were too many of them to plot an allhi, the officers were convinced the women warren't but.

"Whatever it is, he has it," a de-

But an suspect after suspect was cleared, detectives kept returning to.

ch, Almidovar. One of Louisi's girl friends related an interesting story about a party attended by the couple-shortly before they were married. The conversation sumehow had offsted amound to .nurder and Almisdiwar said that it was easy to fall a person.

two fingers against her throat for only a few seconds. She fell down in a they saw no way to prove it.

They felt sure that it was Terry her away from her home. Otherwise, they reasoned, she wouldn't have hesigoing to meet. Almodovar was arrested as a material witness and placed in a cell in the hope that he would erack. After a siege of daily questioning he deliberately butted his head against a cell wall and was sent to a hospital, but he still kept silent and

The police gave him a green suit Almadovar had worn on the night of the murder. Dr. Gettler examined the suit and carefully brushed some dirt from the trouser legs. When he was finished, he had a few grains of sand in an envelope. He also brushed out small black dots from the trouser

Then Dr. Gettler entered the case.

For the next few days he was busy with microscope, magnifying glass, graph of the death scene in the park. made an enlargement, and studied the vegetation. One of the barely vaible black dots taken from the green suit interested him and he spent hours studying it and the

Finally he issued a series of orders that bewildered the detectives. One of them due a hole in the dutch where the body had been found, placed the dirt in a sterile pail, and took it to peced off a hundred varis from the went through the same procedure. Altogether, six holes were due in different parts of the park. In addition, one of the men who lived in Brooklyn was ordered to bring in some dirt from his own backvard.

Dr. Gettler placed the dirt in a began burning it. He also was not neglecting the black dots and fragslides and microphotographs were made of them.

Several weeks slipped by while Dr. Gettler quietly worked with his aswas revived Dr. Gettler telephoned police and instructed them to agrest Almadovar. Despite the alibi of the 22 dancers Terry had murdered his Almadovar vehemently denied the charge and demanded an early trial. His wish was granted. The danner dancer took the witness stand and in Central Park, he replied not for at The stage was set for Dr. Gettler.

his experiments. He said that the of the plant dicoth milleflorium, por usually found in the New York area. photograph clearly showed dicoth

The seeds in the cuffs were onefiftieth of an inch shorter than the normal seeds for this kind of grass. scene to collect some seeds there.

These, too, were one-fiftieth of an Next Dr. Gettler took up the question of the sand brushed from a spectograph machine, which is used to determine what elements are con-The machine showed that the grains of sand taken from the trousers matched exactly with the dirt from the other six spots in the park, including the one just one bundred yards away, differed greatly. The matching seeds and dirt meant that Almadovar had not only been in The alibi verified by the 22 dancing partners was easily explained. True, Almadovar had not missed a dance, missions. During one of these he had slipped out of a bathroom window, his wife, hurried back to the daoce

When Dr. Gettler finished testifying, a jury required exactly three minutes to find the dancer guilty of first-degree murder. As he was being seoteoced, Almadovar made a frenzied attempt to another killer who thought he was too clever to be caught.

FOR MYSTERY FANS - three swiftly-paced, spine-tingling mystery

A Mercury Mystery - "Fatal Bride" (formerly "The Curtain

Between"), by Van Siller. Abridged edition. The New York Times comments, "Dramatic and suspenseful,"

BESTSELLER MYSTERY - "Kiss the Bloode Goodbye" (formerly "Ghost Wanted"), by Finlay McDermid. Abridged edition. "The suspense mounts from page to page," says the New York Times.

A longeran Press Mystery - "The Big Knockover" (formerly

'$106,000 Blood Money'), by Dashiell Hammett. "Hammett

THE ONLY FORMULA

As the time Minam Brace adminted "Devel Lantis" in EJMM1, Taine Annual Cantest, in which her trays was an Hamonable Mentine, Missing Brace was a members of Dashful Hamourit's Mystery Story Cetair. This is the second aron, herefore, that we have practicated from students of Mr. Hamourit's course. Miss Brace was born in Manhatan. She 1 and admins of the Unarreity of Missings, Fra a couple of years the counted the theater, then took to writing "confiction" and other "back work" on upport hey paints of the foodling. In World War II the reved exer-seas in the American Red Cross.

For the first quarter-century of he life the had no insention a destress of phononing a neiter. One day the 'tripfin' with the idea, become interested of the interest of the

when, many were not, the financial difference between a story being asoperadely a "distill "magazine and being rejected was a small that it hardly mattered, but Mits Bruce persevered — the light to see her name in print, to After some mercus with pulp stories Mits Bruce acube one moring to discover herself not famous but firmly resolved to urise thereforth only what the pleared — and hang the consequence." "I had had time," the written because it pleased me to write it.'

For years Miss Brown had been reading superity stories and great species, although membrashy the had been sunderseat the explanations at the end. This proceed a severe handlessy not only in the reading being the first of the end. This proceed a severe handlessy not only in the reading being the end of the end. I have first the think as in movemery for an explanation at the end. I have first that at detective fixtion the privat a lost of modellogs for a formation the results never memorably coughted. So found the end is the end of the assesses it.

No, there is no formula for the detective-crime story — at least, no formula which, on pushing this button and pulling out that stop, manufactures the praceless ingredients of frethness, imagination, and integrity.

The only formula for a truly creative writer is simply this: do not be afrearm high, and when you have adjusted your sights, aim higher still

DEAR LOUISA

by MIRIAM BRUCE

Stoome Park, Mass. ever your shortcomings, you are a

Dear Louisa,
You will no doubt be surprised to bear from me after all these years, particularly since we parted with some colchess. However, I trust that by now you have forgotten our small mixtunderstanding. Actually, it was not I who was responsible for the fore-who last somehow got the idea that you had done me an injustace.

I have decided to resume our finestedly, Douas Orbowsoly it will finestedly, Douas Orbowsoly it will referredly, Douas Orbowsoly it will see not made. And the see that we are you too, are contined to your room by illness. Dr. Low has soured me that an outself interest will divert my mind from poor Greweron, and at a many of the property of the property of your never to see Stephen Lows of year never to see Stephen Lows how you were able to purchase your house heat. My Martha has been informed by your mend that you meters.

Recalling your past bigh-handedness, Louisa, I suppose there is the possibility that you will not wish to enter into correspondence with me. However, I hope the passage of years has made you more sentible. What-you wish.

Porter and a member of my own generation. Let's let bygones be bygones. You may consider this an apology if you wish.

Martha will carry this note to you and will call for any communication you may care to make in ceturn.

Your friend and schoolmate.

Broome Park April 7th

Dear Louna,

I must confess I recall nothing amusing in my letter to you. Nevertheless, I was pleased to receive your reply and suppose I must accept your rather odd sense of humor as part of you that the years have had no power to change.

You describe your heart condition as "something between a murmur and a shout." It seems to me that you are treating the situation with undue lightness, considering that your mother and your paternal gandlather both succumbed to heart father both succumbed to heart disease.

My own trouble is nervous and I attribute it completely to Harley's selfish and callous action. My health started to fail not lone after he took many years of life . . . glad, not so much on my own account as for the sake of Grosvenor, who unhappily in-

Dr. Low insists that I am a victim of myasthenia, a newfangled muscular treated. When he first presented this absurd diagnosis five years ago, I went to the trouble of reading a number of medical books on the subject. I found that Stephen Low was completely wrong. It seems that myasthenia attacks the muscles, particularly about the throat and eyes, and induces extreme fatigue. It is true that I am subject to attacks of weariness, but that is entirely due to nervous strain. As for my eyes, they have always been had. Nevertheless, Dr. Low, unwilling to admit he is mistaken, persists in submitting me to a daily injection of something he calls prostigmin. I am perfectly aware that this is all an elaborate naummery; I have seen the them to be nothing but distilled water, or at must a harmless tonic, I have tried more than once to find another physician, but each has proved more incompetent than the ast, and in spite of Dr. Low's stubbornness. I can at least be assured of his personal interest in me.

Dear me. Louisa, it must be over twenty years since you last saw Stephen Low. He hasn't changed a great deal. He's completely gray, of course, but as slovenly and careless as ever and still characterized by that eather pointless brand of humor you used to find so amusing. He's worn the same baggy pepper and salt tweeds for the past ten years, not from motives of thrift which would be understandable, but out of sheer indifferthat be still offers marriage to me. I must confess that I find considerable comfort in the fact that someone values me, even if it's only Stephen Weariness compels me to lay down my pen, Louisa, Perhaps I shall feel strong enough to resume it after

Really, Grosvenor has grown more impossible every day. I had hoped that in spite of his difficult childhood he might become a credit to me, but at thirty-four he still exhibits his early traits of weakness and lack of stamina, I try to be patient with him because of his infirmity, I cannot imagine why he should have contracted poliomylitis as an infant; cerhave been anything but excellent physical specimens. Grosvenor's single charm - his exact physical resemblance to his father - is of course marred by his crippled the fact that I insisted upon his wearing a brace throughout most of his

His most maddening trait is a continual conviction that he is illwhich of course he is not. He is always discovering new symptoms in himself and seeking cures for them. His recent addiction is to a type of capsule that he carries in a small, green bottle in his pocket. Dr. Low sources me that the capules are harmless. Groov-toor's weaknesses might be folgrayable if he were an affectionate or dutuful son. He is reither. For example, he saus early a quarter of an hour late to our resding hour today. His secure when he finally limped in weather that he had fallen askep at all believe he had fallen askep at all the late of the hard some fall that had been askept to the had some some fall that had been askept to the had some fall that had been askept to the had some fall that had been askept to the ha been late this week. Certainly be thould have no doubt as to what time! I expect him after twelve years of bidding our little reading hour daily. Then when he leeps his reading—we are re-duing Water Pater — he secured a million miles away. I do histories to that official the result of his bidden to that official the result of th untrue to life . . . a selfish woman who drove her husband to suicide and their crippled, ineffectual son. Hon-weren't that Martha keeps me informed, I should be completely unaware of what he is doing.

aware of what he is doing.

The money Grosvenor receives for these stories is not, apparently, sufficient to maintain him. He still lives on the income which I have assigned cient to maintain him. He still lives on the income which! I have assigned him—subject to my supervision, of course. I am convinced that if he could afford it, he would leave my house without a qualm. You no doubt resize how difficult it is for me to admit that my own son is lacking in a diffiction for me, but I'm affold that Growenor resembler his father morally as well as in person.

Well, Louisa, a woman as ill as you should not be obliged to listen to an account of an unduriful son. How fortunate you are that your last days are peaceful!

SARAH GROSVENOR BEACH

Broome Pa

Dear Louisa,

I have discovered why Grosvenor has been acting so strangely lately. It seems unbelievable, but he has become involved with a woman.

I am too disturbed to write more than a brief note now, I shall give you a full account of any action I decide upon. Really, Louisz, it's amazing how much closer I feel to you than I did years ago, even before our little difficulty.

he had no talent whatsoever. He became quite sulky and never agaio the account of Julia Dollard's funeral, mentioned his work to me. If it But what did you mean by savine. "Thanks for your commiscration on my heart gallop, but would you please omit flowers until absolutely neces-

Your friend.

Sarah Grosvenor Beach

Broome Park April 9th

Well, let me start from the beginning. As I told you yesterday, I discreered that Groovenor has been carrying on with some woman. This, after emasderation, was less surprising than it seemed to me at first. Cernainly the Groovenor name and money could not fail to attract a woman.

As for Grosvenor, this involvement merely makes the resemblance between him and his father complete. I have never told you this, Louisa after all, we have only recently been on intimate terms - but shortly before my husband's death I had exidence that there was another women. I know this must seem incredible; nevertheless it is true. I began to suspect something soon after I induced Harley to abandon his absurd idea of being a concert pianist and to so into Father's office. He began to spend evenings away from home, and although his excuse was that he was playing chess with Dr. Low, I wasn't deceived. One day I was able to confront him with evidence - I found in his pocket a handkerchief scented with cheap violet cologne.

Harley didn't even show the good taste of denving my allegations, and other woman and wished me to divorce him. Naturally, I refused and told him that unless he terminated the connection I should not allow him to see Grosvenor again. He capitulated, of course.

I have never had an instant's doubt that my procedure was the correct one, not only for my take and Gresvenor's but for Harley's as well. After that incident his conduct was unexeptionable; he coased trying to cross me at every turn and our married life was perfectly happy— until the night

I am giving you this background, Louiss, so that you'll understand why I was not surprised when Martha reported to noe that Grosvenor, like his father before him, had allowed himself to be ensaared by a woman of the most unacentable type.

I am an extraordinarily perceptive person, Louisa. I was made immediately aware by Martha's attitude the other day that she had news for me. She came into the room with her eyes sparkling and her lips compressed.

It seems that Growenor has been seeing this young woman for rearly two months. Her name is Mary Trent. She is a New Yorker and has been brought to Broome Park to catalogue the new Higgins Collection at the Public Library. This is what comes of importing outside labor.

Martha assured me that Luke

Martha assured me that Luke Spivens told her that Grosvenor is seen in this young woman's company constantly. (You remember Luke, don't you, Louisa? The handyman at the library - a very worthy and reliable old person. I was instrumental in inducing the Library Board to grant him a rise in salary fourteen years ago.) Luke told Martha that at her lodging house, that they lunch together frequently, and that only last week Miss Trent was seen wearing a nosegay of violets pinned to her dress. Violets! Like father, like son! Can you imagine the duplicity of imagine my distress. This afternoon I was so exhausted I could barely lift my field glasses to look out of the Low, all he did was to increase my dose of prostigmin. Useless, of course However, I am feeling better now.

Our reading hour today was fareical. Grosvenor kept interrupting himself to glance at his wateh and didn't had a more pressing engagement satirically, of course - he pretended

Long before the hour was over he siderable patience I reminded him that it lacked four minutes of three hurried over the marked passages," I told him, "Would you be so good as to repeat them slowly?" My patent displeasure seemed to have not the slightest effect on him. As he was leaving the room at three twenty. I gave him a last chance to abandon his deceitful attitude. "Is there something you'd like to tell me, Grosvenor?" I asked. For a moment his expression was so much like his in that dreadful, secretive way that Harley had and said, "No. Mother, there's nothing I'd like to tell you." I heard him whistling as he hurried prise that he had left his green bottle room, "If you want to see why be was in such a rush," she told me, "just dropping on the reading hour - she always has since the day Grosvenor down the stairs, and I noted with sur-brought home the book by that dreadful D. H. Lawrence - I sum-Through my field glasses I saw meet him, "She's been waiting on the corner of Spruce and Summit since rebellious my son is to guidance from three o'clock," Martha told me. "She was there last Saturday, too." Loursa, this person has nothing to recommend her. She is plain, badly dressed, utterly lacking is style, and very nearly Grosvenor's own age. In feature she rather resembles yourself, and she has a quantity of brown hair pulled back from her face with unbecoming simplicity.

Their exhibition on meeting was disgosting, She held out her hand and Groweroe show it rather forms. The sharing meeting the sharing more like a schools by than a man of thirty four, and they stood clasping hands in the middle of Spruce Street. Groweroe said something and Wits Trent Buygled, for what reason I couldn't determine. After a moment of Groweroe beauth too. Then Groweroe beauth too. Then he took her arm and they walked off toward Summit Avenue. This simply cannot go on. I intend to take steps immediately.

SARAH GROSVENOR BEACH

Broome Park April 12th

Dear Louisa,

I have just been subjected to a frightful scene. I am utterly exhausted. Only the fact that I am completely in the right gives me the strength to go un.

I resolved to confront Grosvenor with my knowledge of his connection with this woman at our reading hour today. Knowing only too well how myself, I dended to enlist the aid of Dr. Low, whom for some reason Grosvenor respects. After luncheon I sent Martha to summon him. I must admit Stephen Low arrived promptly. He burst intu the room, his face pale and his coat unbuttoned. He stared in astonishment as he saw ane sitting upright on the chaire longue. "For God's sake, Sarah," he such, not very cordially, "what's all this about?

very cordially, "what's all this about?

Martha told me you'd had an attack."

I knew very well what Martha laid told him. "Sit down. Stephen." I said.

in "This is important."

"So are my patients, regardless of what you seem to hink." However, he sat down and gave me his attention. He glanced at my new like dressing gown and my hair which I'd had Martha dress high especially for the occasion. "Well, my imperietable Sainh, what job do you have far me this time?" he asked. "Its there a grave you want robbed, or merely an old friend to be quictly put unt of the friend to be quictly put unt of the way?"

I igaored his tasteless humar. "I have discovered that Grosvenoe is involved with a woman, Stephen. I intend to talk to him about it today. I need your help."

"Do I understand that you want me to give Grosvenor a belated talk on the facts of life?"

me to give Grosvenor a betated talk on the facts of life?"
Naturally, I ignored the question. I would have given Dr. Low an idea of what I planned to say, but at that instant Grosvenor knocked. Louisa, I wish I could tell you that me congratulate you, Mother, For once you seem to be right about

Dr. Low opened his mouth to silent, "May I ask if you're planning to marry this woman?" I inquired.

Grosvenor looked at me defiantly "If she'll have me, yes. I haven't asked her ver.

What a relief it was to me that the betrothal! I knew that gentle firmness trophe.

"My dear boy," I said, with considerable sympathy in my tone, "I Low and I must talk to you very seriously about the state of your

Dr. Low gave me a startled glance it. He stared at me, apprehension kent it from you but, frankly, you will never be well enough to marry." Suddenly Grosvenor covered his battle was nearly won. "If you really care for this young woman, you won't burden her with someone who might said. I had no wish for him to lie, of course. What I had told Grosvenor might very possibly be so. Who can

Louisa, you simply will not credit my friend of half a century's standing, the man who had always claimed to care for me, a physician whose first duty is surely toward his patient. stood there and calmly gave me the "That's utter nonsense, Sarah," he

Grosvenor except acute hypochon-

as he took them from his face, "You're venor's shoulders. I could have slapped them both, "Of course I'm sure! It's just your mother's imagination working overtime again. She worries about you too much." Grosvenor laughed uppleasantly,

"Is that it, Mother?" he asked, "Do you worry about me too much? Is all venor turned savagely and limped toward the door. He left without even saving goodhye. this point I nearly became panicstricken. It seemed highly possible that Dr. Low, by his stupidity, had Low turned to me and said, "Somespots of yours, Sarah," I lost control of myself completely. I told him to leave my bouse and never to return. He laughed that infuratingly inane laugh of his and reached in his bag for his hypodermic needle. "Hate to be caught, doo't you, Sarab? Roll up that pretty sleeve. It's time for your injection."

I repeated my orders to him. He

I repeated my orders to him. He stared at me as though I could not possibly be serious.

"I've endured your incompetence long enough," I told bim. "I've kept you on mostly out of pity for you. You've repard me with disloyalty of the worst sort. Now I want you to

I could tell that I'd hit the mark.

"I had no idea that my dog-like devotion was so offensive to you, Sarah," he said. "I'll relieve you of it as soon as you find another doctor. Meanwhile, you'd better have your injection."

I am a difficult woman to deceive, Louisa. I was completely aware that his motive in insisting upon the injection was to try to prove to me that he was indispensable. He failed, of course.

"I looked him squarely in the eye.
"You're wasting your efforts, Stephen. I know very well that that hypodermic contains nothing but distilled water."

He samulated astonishment,
"Will you go, please?" I said. "I'm very tired. This unfortunate scene has completely exhausted me."
"It's your disease that's exhausted

you, Sarah," he said brutally. "If you don't let me give you the prostigmin, you'll probably be dead by morning."

A lesser womao might have allowed herself to be blackmailed. I did not. "Spare me the embarrassment of having to send Marris for the roller me.

"Spare me the embarrassment of having to send Martha for the police to remove you," I said coldly.

Well, Louisa, he finally left, I rang

Well, Louisa, be finally left, I rang for Martha who teld me that Greevenor had left the house and gone in the direction of the bleavy. I have spent the remainder of the afternoon in attact of agistanton. Writing to you has callened me a little. It is nearly dimens time sow, and I find that I grow momentarily more tired, Six doctions that the property of the prope

Your friend, Sarah Grosvenor Beach

> Broome Parl April 14th

How good it is to be alive! The sun is streaming in through my windous and outside! Can bear the laughter of children. I very nearly left all this, Louisa. Fortunately I'm better now, although this can be only a short note as Dr. Low has warned me against overeserting movelf.

I must confess that I misjudged Stephen Low. He is my truest and most loyal friend, and if it were not for him I should not be here. deliver my last letter to you - there are some things in that letter, Louisa, -I began to feel very strange. My hands trembled and my breathing became difficult. I lay back among the pillows and gradually a dreadful, cold lassitude began to creep over me. I was completely unable to move my that Martha might speedily return. At last I heard her key in the door, but I hadn't even the strength to pull the bell cord to summon her. I heard to prepare my dinner. I gathered all my strength and tried to call out. It was impossible. My breathing became shallower and shallower. Finally, with one last effort. I managed to push the glass off the table at my elbow. For a moment there was silence in the kitchen below and I thought Martha heard. Then the clatter of dishes began again, Consciousness started to fade from me. The last thing I remem-

the downstairs ball. Well, Louist, you have guessed it. Dr. Low's diagnosis was correct after all. I am a victim of myastenia. I must admit that it was a considerable shock for me to learn this. However, Dr. Low assures me that I can still look forward to many years of life with the sid of my daily injection of ber is a peremptory ringing of the Louisa, you've no idea what effect being near to death has on the human spirit. I have a whole new perspective on everything. I feel that I must be worthy of the Providence that has spared me, I have told Martha that from now on instead of saving the bread crusts to make pudding, she is to spread them for the birds.

SARAH GROSVENOR BEACH P.S.: I have thought of a plan that will once and for all end Grosvenor's relationship with this impossible young woman.

April 15th

Dear Louisa,
Thank you for your sympathetic letter and for the bosouet. Violets are not my favorite flower, but I am sure you meant the gift kindly.

I am feeling very well today.
Martba has been called home for a few days because of her sater's illness, and Grovenor is looking after me. He is incent and stunde how at least his incent and stunde how at least his duties keep him in the house.

I have disposed of the woman.
My plan was simplicity itself. I'm amazed that I didn't think of it sooner. I merely wrote a short note to Lambert Jones — you will remember

soner. I merely wrote a short note to Lamberr from daning school; he was the clumsy one with the small head; he is now president of the First National Bank and head of the Library Board. I told Lambert that I wished him to dismiss Mary Trent instantly and send ther back to where she came from. I anticipated no difficulty with care of that—and of course there was nose. Martha was back within the bour with a message that my request would be compiled with and that Lambert hanself would put Miss Trent on the six o'clock train to New York. She is undoubtedly on her way to the station at this moment on the station at the moment.

Excuse me, Louisa. There is a ringing on the downstairs bell and Grosvenor has gone to open the door. I wonder who it can be. I am not expecting Dr. Low until four.

Louis, you will find what I am about to tell you nearly incredible. I never, never would have believed such effrontery possible — even from a New Yorker. I heard Grosvenor open the door and give an exclamation of surprise. A female voice, with an accent that I can only describe as common, said, "Where's your mother's room, Grosvenor? I want to talk to ber."

I heard the sound of footsteps running up the starts and a peremptory knock. The door burst open. Yes, Louisa, you have guessed it.

It was the Trent woman.

She neither waited for Grosvenor to introduce us nor inquired after my health. "Why did you have me fired from my job, Mrs. Brach?" she demanded.

She didn't wait for an answer but went on to inform me that denials on my part were useless since Lambert Jones had admitted that it was I who had requested the dismissal. You can imagine the effect of all this on Grosvenor. He looked at me as though had he dated, he would have struck me. I decided to take a firm stand. "You have been a permicious influence on my son, Miss Trent," I said. "My decision is final. Your coming here to plead with me to reverse it is outse useless."

Besides being insolent, Miss Trent is a fool. As she heard my last words she suddenly hurst into laughter. She laughted until I began to fear that I had an hysterical woman in my bedroom. Then she attopted and wheat

"Bless you," she said at last,
""gue's straight out of the Boston Museum, aren't you't I sasure you I haven't come here to plead with you.
I in fact, now that I think of it. I'm not sure what I did come for." She turned I to Grosvenor and there suddenly were team in her eyes. The woman is obviously a consummant actress. "Goodhye, Grosvenor," the said. "Thands "Thands."

for all the violets

I saw a look of indiction creeping into Groevenot's eyes. I hunted dependently about for some way of forceing the woman to leave, hunt I could be think of none short of calling the dependent of the say out know, Louisa, I do not have a telephone. Groovenor imped toward her and put his hands on her arms. "I can't let you go," he said fatuowalth, "Mary I can't let wo

"Why don't you come with me?" she asked. The woman was utterly brazen. She took a step toward him peoed with me lying there on the chaise longue helpless to intervene when there was a knock on the door and Dr. Low came into the room. "Take this women away, Stephen," I directed, "My symptoms are increasing. expect Stephen Low to behave intelligently in a crasis. He glanced woman and Grosvenor seized the onportunity to make a number of accusations against me. Dr. Low turned to me with a look of injured surprise, "Sarah, you actually had Miss Trent fired?"

I was not in a mood to listen to moralizing from Stephen Low, "Don't be stupid, Stephen," I said with perhaps unwarranted candor. "I was perin a manner that could not possibly fused to support me." I turned to Grosvenor, "Are you determined to marry this woman?"

"Yes, I am, Mother," Grosvenor replied rather unsteadily. "Very well," I said. "Of course I can't stop you. May I ask what you plan to live on?" "That will be stopped. I am still executrice of your grandfather's es-

"I can work," he said. I looked at his useless leg and smiled. I'm sure you understand, Louise, that I was being cruel only to be kind. "Can you?" I asked him. "We'll get along," said Miss Trent. But I noticed that Grosvenor was silent. "Come along, darling," she said. I detest indiscriminate endear-

"lust one thing more," I added. It was apparent to me that Grosvenor was once more caught in his usual panic of weak-kneed indecision. "It's only fair to warn you, Grosvenor, that tomorrow I shall change my will. ward me as a son. I see no reason why you should reap the benefits of one." Miss Trent pretended complete indifference. But the effect go Grosveoor was what I had expected. He looked from the woman to me and back to the woman again. Then he bottle and hastily gobbled a pill. where her own interests are concerned, grasped Grosvenor's arm. "Don't be a fool, Grosvenor!" she said. "The money doesn't make any Grosvenor pushed his hair hack from his forehead. I recognized the "I'm sorry, Mary," he said Well, the long and short of it is that no avail. I kept completely out of the discussion so that Grosvenor could make his own decision, and offered no further comment except to remind Mgs Trent that if she didn't hurry she would miss her train. When she left I suggested that Grosvenor see her to the station. I wanted to impress him with the fact that I was not being unreasonable.

The woman argued, of course, but to

By the time they left I was beginning to feel rather tired. It was past time for my injection, and besides I was expenencing the fatigue in a just cause.

When the door closed behind them,
I turned my attention to Dr. Low.
Louiss, I was shocked at the man's appearance! He had collapsed into a chast and his hands were covering his

"Stephen," I sud, "What is it? Are you ill?" You may be sure that I was very disturbed at his attitude, not only because it was time for my injection but also out in personal concern for him.

He did not reply to my question but raised his face from his hands. He looked very haggard and for the first time it occurred to me that Stephen Low is getting to be an old man. "Why did you do that, Sarah?" he demanded.

Thad no intention of justifying my actions to Stephen Low. I simply pointed out that what I had done had been entirely for Grossenor's own good "Furthermore," I continued, "I've given my whole life to Grosvenor, and I don't see why he should cavalierly abundon me in my old

Dr. Low merely sat there silently, suffered a great shock. I could not and cannot now imagine why he was so utpact. "Some day Grosvenor will thank me for ending this unfortunate relationship." I said reasonably. "I have merely protected him from his nwn susceptibility, just as I did his awn susceptibility.

father."
The illustrate my point, I told Dr.
Low how I had hazdled Harley's deviation. When I had finished he said slowly, "I suppose I always knew it was something like that that made Harley do it."

"Nonerne," I said. "Harley wasn't in his right mand when he committed suicide. Everyone knows that people commit suicide because of temporary insanity." I was really annoyed at his obtuseness, but I maintained my temper. "Coppe, Stephen, you see cused me the other day of having a blind spot. It's you who have one."

Dr. Low gave me a long, odd-look as though I were a complete stranger to him. For a moment I positively thought that the excitement had unbalanced his mind. Then he became reasonable again. "You're quite right, Srath, I do have a blind stor. I ve had one for nearly fifty years."

I knew of course that he was referring to his devotion to me — a pun on love being blind, you know it was a relief to see him his old humorous self again. I rold him to and then the held out my arm. "It's after four o'clock. Stephen," I reminded him. And added an a joking tone, "You doesn't it?

He gave me another of those strange looks. Evidently he hadn't got the joke. "What did you say, Sarah?"

"My distilled water," I repeated.
"You know, my injection," My effort at lightness fuled. He relapsed into his peculiar mood. He relayed into his peculiar mood. He walked heavily to the window and stood there staring out for a moment. He passed his hand over his hair. Then he turned and said, "All right, Sarsh," and went into the bathroom to tetrage the hypodermic.

When he came out he was pale and trembling, "For heaven's sake, Stephen," I said, out of patience at last, "you're behaving like Grosvenor!" "We have a great deal in common, Grosvenor and L'' he said. He poised the needle over my arm, then stopped.

"Can't you find the vein?" I in-

He disregarded my question. "Sarah, do you really intend to go through with disinheriting Grosvenor?" he asked.

"That depends entirely on him," I said. "So long as he behaves, I shall postpone the making of a new will. I shall tell him so tomorrow. It should prove a spur to future good

"I see," said Dr. Low. He found the vein and inserted the needle. He left immediately afterward. He did not recover his good spirits. Poor man, be's so devoted to me that he's as disturbed by my troubles as chough they were his own to bear. I'm really very inted – the effect of nerve street, of course, and then I've been writing for early see home. I've been writing for early see home meet than enyone cise completely understands rac. This is ruber strange because — well, I've going to let you in on a little secret. Louiss. At one care lareastly believed that you were mediated and the secret for the secret for

I shall really have to stop. I'm so I'm so what is trembling and I've commenced to fiel an obstruction in my chest. If I didn't have so much confidence in Stephen Low, I should be worsied about the possibility of another attack. I think I'll just lock my door so that when Grosvenor comes home I won't be subjected to discussion or argument.

It must be fixedly six o'cleck. In a little while the Trent woman will be gone and Growveror will be free of be forever. Yes, there's the whirting sound that Father's clock always makes a minute before it strikes. Harley used to call it Time holding in breath, waiting for something to largers. It's getting outer thirk and it's going to storm. There's the hour striking now. I've never been so tired. I shall sleep soundly onsight.

> Your friend, Sarah Grosvenor Beach

Access canases: With the high of careful Worksh hamily and the services amount of patients alone upon the midst of after United Asserts and Configuration for large with media of pater United Asserts and Configuration Statistics of the midstand and configuration of Workshi attempts—on the size that these the United Asserts as might now of them has now been transmit before an presented published and might now the configuration of the midstand to the configuration of the midstand propriates and the configuration of the configuratio

JOHNNY ON THE SPOT

FURNIE CLOCK on the wall of the cafe: ing here fo

It eris sad quarter to four in the morning when he came in from the street. He wan't even tweaty-eight yet, Johnny Donovan. Any doctor in town would have given him fifty more years. Only he himself knew better than that. He didn't even have fifty about, or maybe fifty minutes, depending on how good be was.

There hadn't been anyone in sight on the street when he came in just now, he'd made sure of that, and this place was half the island away from where anyone would expect to find him; that was why he'd started coming here for his food the post few ingless and that was why he'd old lean to meet him here tonight, after her lists show at the clads, if does her list show at the clads, if does had to see him so bad. Poer kol, le save felt oury for her! Married at seventien, and a widow at eighteen any minute now. There was not than any here was glad of, then bet domained to of course, but they didn't know about her; didn't even know the existed. And disacting travels from legicly right as one of fleely Borden's own clubs, the first was a few forms of the course of the course first was a few forms of the course of the course for the course of the course of the course of the first ware a knowle form legicly and the first were a knowle form legicly and the course of the first were a knowle form legicly and the course of the course first were a knowle form legicly and the course of the cou "front" down there, while Beefy had guys out looking for him all over town, and would have given ten times that much just to connect with him!

It made him laugh every time he thought of it - almost, not quite. But it wasn't so surprising at that. Beefy was one of those rare, domesticated big shots who, outside of killinghours, thought there was no one like that silver-blond wife and those two daughters of his. Johnny, when he used to drop in their Ocean Avenue apartment on business in the old prohibition days, plenty of times found him there helping his kids with their homework or playing with them on the floor, maybe a couple of hours after he'd had some poor devil buried alive in quicklime out in the wilds of lamaica or dumped overboard from one of his runners with a pail of cement for shoes. That being the case. even a lovely number like Jean couldn't be expected to make a dent trucking around on the hardwood down at the Wicked Nineties, Otherwise he would have asked questions, tried to find out something about her,

But to him she was just a Jean Marvel - her own idea of a stage-tag at sixteen - just a name on one of the dozen payrolls he checked once a even that. She just wasn't. She was: "No. 0 - 6 50 - $200." She'd told Johnny that she'd said "Good evesing" to Beefy one night leaving the club - after all, he was her breadand-butter - and he'd turned around and asked someone, "Who the hell wazzat?"

He was sick of dodging them; had a bellyful of trying to save his precious hide. He had it up to his neck, this business of skeping all day in movie houses and bolting meals at four in the morning and keeping just one jump ahead of them the whole time. The way he felt tonight he almost wished they'd catch up with him and set it choking yourself to death in a gunnysack anyway? You couldn't do it more than once. But there was Jean. Outside of wanting him straight, which had started the whole mess, she also wanted him alive - for some wacky reason or other. He could hear her now, like she had been the last time they'd stolen a brief get-together riding hidden on the back platform of the Shuttle, That was last Sunday, She had faced it into him, eyes flinty, voice husky with scorn:

"Yellow. No, not even yellow. orange! A quitter, And that's what ! married! Ready to take it on the chin. aren't you?" And then pointing to her own lovely dimpled one: "Well, this is your chin?" And pounding herself furiously: "And this is the chear that gets the bullets when you stand up to em! Don't I count? No. I get left behind - without my music, without my rhythm, without my guy, for all you care! Not while I know it! Who is this Beefy Borden - God?" Then suddenly nearly breaking in two: "See it through for me, Johnny. Stay alve Den't welsh on now Just a few days longer! The dough will come through by the end of this week—then we can both han out of this heli-bole together!" And after the train and carried ber back to the Times Square end and he'd lost himself in the Grand Central crond, in has I down over his mouth, be could till heart vinging in his ears. "Stay alve for me, Johanny, Stay alve!" Well, he'd done his beet, but it couldn't keep up this beet, but it couldn't keep up the stay of the stay

There was a taxi driver dozing in the back of the place. He was the only other one in there. Have to quit coning here after tonight: the'd been her three nights in a row now; time to change to snother place. He loosend the knot of his necktie and undid the up batton of his whit. Hadn's changed it in ten days and it was changed it in ten days and it was overed.

compen in ten insystant, was accounted in the control of the control.

He picked up a greaty aluminum ray and slid along the riple rails that basked the counter. He hooked a souther of rails, and some other joint, as he went along. When he got to the end where the counterman was, he add, "Now, unanyade up." He habit's life in just percent through collecting a used in a place on Seath Avenue around two when he'd sported someone over in a corner that looked fa-malar from the back. He had had to

The counterman vapped through a hole in the well bekind hun. "Twoon their back!" and cometting began spirting, Johnny pecked a table all the way in the rear and sat down with his back to the street. He couldn't see who was coming in that way, without rurning, but it made him harder to recognize from outside through the plate glass front. He turned he roflar up in back to hide the shape of his

He took out a much folded newspaper, histed for a perfell, and while crunching shredded where began to fall in the blank squares of a crossword puzzle. He could do that and mean it! You go armin-arm with death for ten days or a couple of weeks, and it loses most of its sting. Even the answer to what it "a spgiving tree" can be more interesting for the time being — help you forget.

He didn't see the maroon car that it came up very soft, coasting to a stop. He didn't see the two well-dressed individuals that got out of it without cracking the door behind them, edged up closer to the lighted window-front and peered in. They exchanged a triumphant look that might have meant, "Well leat in here.

this is our dish."
He was half-dozing over his puzzle
by this time, splinters of shredded wheat clinging to his lips. On the other hand, the sommolent taxi driver, peculiarly enough, suddenly came wide awake and seemed to remember something that required his presence in the washroom. He slipred us there
in the washroom. He slipred us there very deftly without making a sound: got as far away from the door as possi-He rassed the time away counting over a fairly solid wad of fins and sawbucks. Then he met his own eyes in the mirror and he quickly turned his

bead away, like he waso't glad to meet

in a hurry, and they weren't trying to sneak up on the quarry now agy more. They didn't have to, they had him. One of them, who went in for ately vanked two bright-green pasteboards from the box near the door. and his friend could be when they came in a public place. It was like a rattlesnake warning before it strikes. It couldn't have made any difference stuck deen into their coat nockets.

and both pockets were sort of stiff and weighted down. The hell woke Johnny without registering; by the time his eyes opened, he'd foreotten what did it. next to him, shoulder to shoulder, so close the loaded pocket dug into his resume on the lip of the table, pointing Johnny's way. The countermag mattered even if he hadn't been. other, and his own whitened a little.

for too long to stay scared. They looked like three brothers, or three pals, sitting there huddled over the table together, intimate, familiar, "Put it on the table in front of you," suggested the one next to Johnny, 'Keen the newspaper over turned it around and fired through the cloth. He would have gone, but he could have taken one of them with him. But there wasn't morn enough to turn it under his cost, it faced outward where there was nothing but a glass caseful of desserts to get at. He slid it under the oewspaper and the one opposite him hauled it out on the other side and it disaplight once setting at it.

When this tricky feat had been accomplished satisfactorily, the first one said, "We wanna see you. Dono-

"Take a good look," Johnny said in a low voice. "How does a guy that's gone straight appeal to you?"
"Dead," answered the party across

"I've got something you can't kill," Johnny said. His eyes lit up like radio dials and all of a sudden he was proud of himself for the first time since he was in long pants. "Tm straight now. I'm on the level. Not all the bullets in all the gats in all New York can take that away from me."

that away from me." "They can make you smell a lot different in twenty-four hours," the one next to him said. And the one across the way put in: "He thinks lie's gonna get bullets, no lest Wake up, pogie, this ain't 1919, You'll beg for bullets. You'll get down on your knees and pray for 'em before we get through with you!"

Johnny smiled and said, "When the State turns on the heat, they give a guy a last meal; let him order his head off. This being my last meal, let'see if you're big enough to lemme finish what I ordered." He took up his spoon in his left hand.

"We got all night," one assured him. "We'll even pay your check for you. Sing Sing has nothing on us,"

The other one looked at the shreeded wheat and laughed. "That's a hell of a thing to crook with in your guts!"

"They're my guts," observed Johany, chewing away, "and it's my party." He took up the pencil in his right hand and went ahead with the puzzle. "What's a five-letter word for the godders of lover!" he asked nonchalantly.

They exchanged a dubious look, not in reference to the goddess of love however. "Can't you see he's stalling you?" one growled. "How do we know what this place is? Let's go."

The ticket bell at the door rang and a very pretty girl came in alone. Her face turned very white under the lights, like she'd been up all oight. But she wasn't logy at all. She seemed to know just what she was doing. She glanced over her shoulder just once, at the maroon car outside the door, but did not look at the three men at the table at all. Then she picked up a cup of coffee from the counterman and brushed straight by them without a look, sat down facing them one table further back, and, like any respectable eid that hour of the night, kept her long lashes down over her eves while she stirred and stirred the lava with a tin spoon.

Johnny looked at her and seemed to get an inspiration. "Venus," he said suddenly, "that's the word! Why didn't! think of it?" But instead of "Venus" he scribbled on the margin of the diagram: "Stay back—I'm

The others had been taking a short, admiring gander at her too. "Momma!" said one of them. "Is that case to take!"

"Momma!" said one of them. "Is that easy to take!"

"Yeah," agreed the other. "Too bad we're on business. Y'never see 'em like that when you're on y'own

"What's a three-letter word—"
Johnny began again. Theo studienly losing his temper, he exclaumed
"Jeeze'l I cao't do this damn thing!"
He tore the puzzle out of the puzzcrumpled it riritably into a ball, and tossed it away from him—toward the next table.

The girl sitting at it dropped her Ho

paper napkin at that minute, then stoped to pick it up again. The three men got up from the table together and started toward the front of the place. They walked fairly slowly, Johnny in the naidfile, one on each side. Their three bodies were supaged at the hips, where the cost peckets were. The one on the inside the place of the pickets were. The one on the inside the place of the picket were the cost of the picket from the counter from force of habit and began prodding away with one hand.

crack, a nose showed, and then it prudently closed again. The girl at the table was very white and kept stirring her coffee without tasting it, as if she didn't know what her wrist was done at all.

The counterman just then was further down the line, hauling a platter of fried eggs through the hole in the wall. It was exactly ten minutes since Johnny Donovan had first come in, short-order cook must have had to heat up the frying pan first.

"Two bright-side up!" hawled the counternsin. Then he looked at the table and saw that they weren't there any more. They were all the way up by the cash register. He came up after them, hebind the counter, carrying the eggs. "Hey!" he said. "Don't you want your eggs?"

"Naw, he's lost his appetite," one of them said. "Get in the car with him," he murmured to his companion. "I'll pay his check."

He let electric tight in between himself and Johnny, lished out some change, and tossed down the three checks, two blank and one punched. Johnny and the other fellow weat out the door, still shoulder to shoulder, drifted across the sidewalk, and got into the back of the muroon car. The door slapped smartly and the curtain revoced down behind the windows.

The counterman dish't like people who just came into his place to wime chairs and then walked out again on bahak checks the made the mistake of charging for the eggs which haddy been earen. The gift in the back had gotten up now and was moving with a sort of lary walk toward the man who had stayed behind. She'd tacked on a brightered new mouth with her liquities and suddenly dadn't seem so resourchale any more.

"So I'm paying for the egg, an 1" charked the man at the counter. "Chary, hand 'en over." He pulled the last away from the counterman, titled it upward on his pain, fitted it viciously across the other's face, and ground it in with a sort of fulf turn. Egg yolk dripped down in yellow chairs. "Have 'en on me, 'ou mose' chairs." Have 'en on me, 'ou mose'

sapl" he magnanimously offered.
The girl gave a shrill, hrazen hugh of approval that sounded like her voice was cracked. "Gee, sweetheart," she said. "I could go for a guy like you. How does it look for a little lift in your car? I been stemming all night and my dogs are yapping." She deliberately separated a nicket of his glass to pay for her coffee, then nudged him chummily with her elbow. "You and me and a flock of etchings, how about it?", she invited. "Some other time, momma," he said tersely, "Got no time tonight."

He pocketed the rest of his change and stalked out. The counterman was shaking French fried potatoes out of his collar, but he knew enough not to say anything out loud

The girl went out after the fellow who had just turned her down, like some sort of a magnet was pulling her

He'd already gotten in at the wheel when she got over to it. "C'mon, whaddya say?" she pleaded hoarsely. "Don't be selfish. Just a couple blocks lift would be a life saver," She out one foot up on the running board, but one hand to the latch of the door. Her but it took more than that amount of dishevelment to fog its beauty The one at the wheel hesitated, with the motor already turning over. He looked over his shoulder into the darkness questioningly, even longingly. Evidently she'd gotten under his skin. "How about it?" he said to the other one. "Drop ber off at your place and then come back for ber when we're through?" He wanted the She had the door open by now. Ope more move and she would have been answer did not come from the one he'd put it up to at all. It came from their "guest." It was Johnny Donothe crusher on it, strangely enough, A word of warning, a single cry for help from him, and they would have been compelled to take her too, in selfdefense, because she would have caught onto what they were doing He knew enough not to do that, Instead, he said almost savagely: "Kick her out - or is this part of what I get too?"

that.

There was a vicious slap from the rear of the car, but the remark snapped the driver out of it, showed him what a fool thing he'd been about to do. That twist had magnetism or something. He gave her a terrific shove at the throat that sent her skittering backwards off the running board and very nearly flat on her back, grunting: "Where's va manners? Don't crowd like that!" And a minute later the car was just a red tail light a block down, and then it wasn't even

She was still lurching from the push my God, Johnny, you've killed your self?" But she said it very low, so low that the taxi driver who had come out didn't even bear her

They weren't soine to kill him it was he who had killed himselfl Didn't be know she could have saved him? Didn't he know she'd brought a little gun of her own in her handbag he know all she needed was to get into that car with them, and wait for a inventible opportunity, and she could have pulled the trick? She saw where she had made her mistake own; she should have used it right in the stateria while the trill had the chance. But so there thered been two of them covering him, and of the wheel. That was why she'd waited, such as the cover on them for all she was worth, been within an ace of getting was with it — and then at the last from help.

She knew why he'd done it, and she cursed that habit in men of sparing their women. Deha't they know women? Disht they know there was andning on God's earth could be so women when the one she loved was in danger? The toughet tringerman was a Salvation. Army lassie compared to a women at such a time.

minute he himself had to snatch the chance away from her, cut himself off

"They're oor going to have him!" Jean Deasons whipered into the night that surrounded her, eyes hard as mica and so hig they seemed to cover her whole face. "They're oot going—to—ake—him away from me!" One look at her expression and sidering stillow who had been sidering where the other two had left on, changed his mind and stunk away. You don't try to make dates with a tiger.

He took a deep belly breath of relief as he saw the guy in front push

"Thank God," he said to himself. "she stays out of it!" They hadn't, evidently, either one of them recogaized her from the Club: Brefy had two or three, and the Long Island City one was where they did most of their hanging out when they did any. It had been chiefly a Long Island outfit from the begioning. But one peep from her just now, one "Johnny!" and she would have been suok. He'd been seared stiff that she'd give herself away. It was okay now though. monkey. She looked pretty in anylooked back at her through the diamond-shaped rear pane as they zoomed off, then covered himself hy grating, "Damared little burn, rying to horn in! I like to die private."

The one next to him gave him another slap, backhand across the eyes, and they filled with water. "You're gongs," he promised.

They followed St. Nick to 168th, cut west, and connected with Riverside. "Y'got pretty far uptown for a Brooklyn fella," the one at the wheel mentioned. "but oot far enough."

"Is Ratsy gonna be hurord" laughed his mate. "The Big Boy sends him all the way to Buffalo on a phony tip day before yesterday. And Ratsy hates Buffalo, he went to Reform School there! And while he's gone we steag the son right here!"

There wasn't a car in sight on the Drive at that hour; the lights of the hridge were like a string of pearls hanging up in the air behind them. up almost at once. "As quick as all that?" thought Johnny, thankfully, "Then I'm not going to get the trim-mings! There wouldn't be time, out lights, said: "Hurry it up now! We don't winns be hanging around here too long -"

after all," the other one said. "She coulda fronted for us." He took his our out, turned it, swung back, and brought the butt down on the side of Johany's head with a pounding crash. Johnny grouned but didn't go right out, so he smashed him again with it, this time on the other side, then went on: "That gal coulds made it look like a necking party, while we're

"Get busy, and we don't need to be standing still!" was the answer. "Got the blanket? Fix it so it looks like he's soused." The one in back took out copper wire from the side pocket, caught the it cruelly around them. The skin broke instantly and the strands of the wire disappeared under it. Then be did it to his ankles too. Then he propped him up in the corner, took whisky, palmed a handful, sloshed it across Johnny's face, sprinkled the blanket with it, "Let's go," be mut-

traffic lights now!" The lights went up, the driver kicked his foot down, and they arched away like a plane taking off. "It musta been great," he immented mournfully, "in the old days before they had traffic lights!"

"They had no organization in them days," said his companion scornfully "They went to jail like flies - even for emeking safes, mind ya! Take it "We shoulds brought that dame slower, we're getting downtown."

Johnny came to between two redhot branding irons just as they at Seventy-fourth. The outside of his mouth was free, but a strip of tape fastened to his upper gums clamped his tongue to the roof of his mouth The only sounds he could make sounded like the mumblings of a drunk. He saw the black outline of the Jersey shore skimming by across the

They took Canal Street across, then followed the Bowery, which still showed signs of life; he knew it by the El pellars shuffling past. Then the Brooklyn probably. A tue bleated dismally way under them. There hadn't been, strictly speaking, any traffic lights all the way down; they'd all gone out hours ago. It was the street lights flickering in and out of the car they were on guard against. They had to slow up once, in downtown Brooklyn, for a street accident, and there must have been a cop near. They both got very talkative and solicitous all at once. "Head still one in front asked. "Never mind. you'll be home in bed in no time

"What he needs," said the one in back, gun out under cover of the blanket, but not pointing at Johnny this time, "is a good strong cup o'

black coffee " his liquor," said a third voice, outside

at him, under a visor. "Ing, ing, ing." Johnny panted, sweat coursing down his face. He reared desperately toward the sil-

The face pulled back again, "Ouch, what a breath! I could get lit meself on that alone." "I told bim not to mix his drinks."

They swerved out, then in again, sloshed through some water, sped on. The one next to bim caught him hy both cheeks with one hand, dragged them together, beaved his bead back into the corner of the seat. His lower lip opened and blood came out. "That cop," he observed calmly, "don't know how lucky he is he didn't set what you were trying to tell him?" "Did he lamp the plates?" he asked up." He did something to the dashboard and there was a slapping sound from the rear fender. The lights got fewer, then after awhile there weren't any more; they closer he saw that Johany was out wrists at an acute angle ever since they'd left the place where they met and all, and got him out between of the car and an elevator took it down below some place out of sight. Yet this wasn't a garage. When Johnny the second time that night, it was was up in the loft of this building, a big barn of a place, half of it lost in shadows that the mw of coned lights as a tomb, sawdust on the floor, and a Brefy Borden was there, with a white turtle-neck sweater under his cost jacket, nerched on a tall threelegged stool, gargovle-like. The two their cost collars up against the cold. but him they promptly stripped to the waist as soon as he had opened his row of porcelain refrigerator doors

facing him gleamed clinically white.

eyes. The skin on his stomach and as he was, and contracted into soose, pimples. They had left lum upright for a moment, and his knees immediately caved under him, list the sawdust. He beld his spane straight by sheer will power and stayed that way;

sheer will power and stayed that way, wouldn't go down any further. Beefy lit a cigarette, handed his two henchmen one, studied Johnsy in estexteely, seemingly without hatted. "So that's how they look when they go strength," he murmoured. "Why, I thought I die see menthing — pair of wings at keat, or one of these here now heldes shaining on top of his cond. John they would be the shain on the shain of the

with a wink for each one.

One of them jerked his head back by the hair, pried his mouth open, and tore out the tape. A little blood followed, from the lining of the checks. They took away the copper wire from his wrists next.

Beefy fikked asher from his cigacrete, drawled: "Well, III ell you, I think he's had enough, don't you? Wegasts et out for fighen ham a little, daln't we, boy?! think he's learned sho lesson. Whatday any we let him bonne?" He pave them each a long mening look so they got the idea. "Dalp'stra; of course, he's gorts abow the right spirit, ads tr is in the noper way, say he's sorry and all like that. Now suppose you creal over here, right in tout of me, and just ads. beg the normal sort of the sort of the sort of the now well call it course." Johnny saw bis foot resitch; know; it was loaded with a kick for his face when and if he did. It wan't the obly-soo phoniness of the offer that held him back, even if it had been ascany as all that to get out of it—he still wooldn't have done it. Life wasn't that precious. Man has a soul—even a kick from nowhere whom nobody would mist, trapped in a refrigerating plant. He wither to his shackled feet and hobbled a little way toward Beefy, One of them was holding his cost and shirt up for bait, but Johnsy didn't even glance that way, the stared into the pig-eyes of the Big Shot. Then suddenly, without a word, he sput blood and saliva full into his face. "That's the cleanest thing ever touched you," he said hourely, "Gimme death, so I won't have to keep on seeing and snelling youl

Those are my last words. Now try to get another sound out of me!" They knocked him down flat on his back, and he just lay there looking at the ceiling. Beefy got duwn from the stool very slowly, face twitching all over and luminous with rage. He wiped the back of his hand across one cheek, motioned with the other. "Hand me that belt of his." They put it in his hand. He paid it around. caught it at the opposite end from the thin, flat silver buckle. "Go down below and brine up a sack of salt on the elevator with you." His eyes never left Johnny's face. He addressed the remaining one: "Put your foot When I tell you to, you can turn him over on the other sade." Then he spoke directly to Johnny: "Now listen while you're still able to, listen what's coming to you. You're gonna be beaten raw with your own belt. The sale—that's you'll know it. That'll keep the blood in too, so you'll lest while, an hour or two anyway.

Stinging and smarting to death."

Johany didn't answer. Beefy stripped of his coat, swung the buckled strap back in a long hissing are, brought it over and down again with the velocity of a bullet. His assistant steadied his foot against the spann that coursed through what he was holding down. There wasn't a human sound in the place from then

In wouldn't be lated in the phone book, of ourne, so the dobt't come book, of ourne, so the dobt't come book, of ourne, so the dobt't come book of the dobt. For the wheels of that dobt men the season to the season that the theoret to work that the three seasons the season to the se

The police? Weren't they those men in blue that directed tanffa, at crossings? They d find Johany's body eventually—that was about where they fitted in. And even then—that Druckman case awhile back, for instance. There was only one man who could stop what was going to happen in time, and that was the man who had starred it. Thank God, the knew that much at least; knew which direction the blow had come from. She had wagled the whole setup out of Johany weeks ago.

She darted out into the readway, where anything on wheels would have to stop for her, and began to run entity) along. A pair of heady twinkled across from left to right at the next intersection, half a block down, and she sereamed at them, brought them atousd in a half circle to a stop, it was a private machine, with a "seif scout" in it, "Wanna lift?"

She came up panting, "Fiftyeighth Street — oh, for the love of God, get me down there!"

"Whos! That's not the right spirit.

"Whos! that's not the right sprit.
Y'wanna look at this thing a little more sociably. I'm not in the hacking business—" But she'd fled onward already.
She yot her cab a minute later, it had turned in toward her. "The Wicked Nineties," the transpled, "No, never mind your meter. I'll give you twenty dollars flat, twenty-five, anything, only get me there. Cut loose!" She took out the hard-earned money that was to have gotten them to Miam, shooks it at him. "It's a mutter of life and death, d'you understand?" 138 ELLERY QUEEN'S HYSTERY MAGA

She took out the gun, fixed it, while they harched down the endless lengths of Sr. Nicholas Avenou. Bannerman, her boss, Beefy's "front" down there—he'd know; he'd be able to tell her where to reach him, if she had to shoot him to get it out

"Good boy!" she breahed feetently as he tore into the purk at troth intread of taking Fifth. Fifth was strught and the park had curves, but he knew what he was doing; you could make any speed you wanted to in there at this dawn hour. When they came out at Fifty-ninth, he street lighth had just gone out all over town. Two two-wheeled skirb more and they were in front of where is worked, not a light thowing outside

"Here's thirty," she said, vaulting out, "Now stay there, wait — you've got to take me some place else yet! You'll get all the rest of this, if you'll

Tool ig et al the rest of thus, it you in the control of the contr

She went through the desk like a vectore, dropping papers and whole drawers around her. She couldn't find it is the she was a couldn't find it is the she will be find a couldn't find a look before he went in it was not little private memorandum book in the inside pocket of that, Both of them, the home address and the telephone number, flust the anitals, 1B. But that was it. Way over in Brook-

She grabbed up the hard-set and began to back sway at it. Dead, More grief, the club operator had gone home long age. She picked up 10 Banuer-man's hunch of keys, found the one to the office door, slipped out, and locked that up after her too. A munute later he hard a crash as he busted down the lavestory partition. She was all recity around a the main switchboard recity around a the main switchboard had been considered to the constraint of the constraint of

No answer — but then it was a §
A.M. call. "Keep it up, operator, keep it up!" She turned her head and yelled at one of the terrified scrubwomen: "Keep away from that door, you! He's drunk as an owl in there!"
Suddenly there was a woman's voice in her ears, sleepy, frightened
too. "Hellb, who — who do you too. "Hello, who — who do you want?"

"Lemme talk to Borden. Borden, ouisik! Got an important message for

"He's not here --"
"Well, where can I reach him!

"Well, just a minute until I find out." "He didn't say where he was going He went over to the house phone.

- he never does - he -" "Who is this? Speak up, can't you,

"This is his wife. Who are you? How'd you know where he lives? No one ever rings him here -" "I'm the girl with the dreamy eyes!

the message myself The driver was still turning the three tens over and over when she nue -- and just as fast as ever!" Bannerman got to the club en-doors in succession had spoiled the part in his hair.

number that had been in Bannerman's memo book, and naturally he'd have the roof --- she didn't need the night operator to tell her that. She gave the backman another thirty. Now wait some more. I know you think I'm crazy, but - but maybe

"It ain't my business," be said

She wasn't coming back this time, wouldn't hurt to have him handy. "Certainly I'm expected," she told the ballmao. He didn't like the bour, in the shaft up to the penthouse, and it was automatic; by keeping her thumb pressed to the starter he couldn't reverse it and get her down again. He'd bring cops in right away; they were probably cating out of Beefy's hard for miles around here.

The elevator slide let her right out into the apartment, and the hallman was already buzzing like mad from below to warn them. Bonden's young wife was heading for the instrument from the room beyond, in pattering bare feet, as Jean got there. She'd thrown a mink coat over a nightgown. She stopped dead for a minute, then went right on again under pres-"Don't make me do somethine I don't want to," Itan said softly, "Just say it's all right; that you were expecting me. Well, go on, say it?" " 'Sallright, was expecting her," the woman slobbered into the house phone. Jean clicked it off for her-

"Uh-uh-uh," the Borden woman spottered, stalling for time. "Come on! Can't you tell by my face not to fool around with me?"

since about ten that evening. He never told her anything about his had been in her anger. "He's got my man in a spot — right now, this very minute — and I'm going to pay him back in his own coin! Either you help me head him off io time or you get it yourself!"

"He doesn't do things like that, not my Beefy. You've got him wrong.
They've given you a bum steer. Now wait a minute, honey; don't lose your oice way! Hooest, if I knew where he was! I'd tell you. One of his tolk managers, Bannerman, he might know."
Her loosened hair fell down over her

"That's what I'm thinking too,"

Jean said curtly. "I just came from Bannerman, but I didn't have any inducement—then, to get him to tell me. We'll try out to how—but not from here. Come on. You're coming with me—back to my own place! Pick up that house phone! What's the guy's name down there! Jerry? Say, Jerry, will you come up here a minute? Take the public elevator."

The gun raised her to her feet like a lever. "Jerry, will you come up here a minute." Take the public elevator." Then she said craftaly, "Yes."

Jean's hand sealed the orifice like a fish. "He asked you if there was anything wrong, dido't he?" She raised the gun. "Make it, Yes, we think we see a man outside on the terrace." She tore her away from it. "Now, come on!" She began pulling her after her to the wairing private elevator. "My feet are bare!" the captive There was a pair of galoshes standing near the elevator, Jean scuffed them into the car. "Stick 'em in those going down!" Further back, in a recess, a red-glass knob had lighted up

They started down. Again Jean kept they started down. Again Jean kept the couldn't cut them off from above. The lobby was deserted. She pulled Mrs. Borden, in nightgown, galoshes, and mink cost, into the cab after lier. "Manhattan" she chipped at the avarious driver. "And this time you're really going to get dough!"

It was getting lighter by the minute now, but was still too early for anything to be open. She stooped him at an all-night drug store down near Borough 1431, hauded her furred freight in after her. "This woman's real sick," she threw at the sleepy clerk, and the two of them crusted into one phone booth, Mrs. Borden on the inside.

She didn't know where to reach Bannerman at his home, any more than her presoner did (and she believed her), but she was paying he'd stayed on at the Nioettes on account of those two smashed doors and to see if she'd lifted anything from his office.
She rans the club. He answered him-

"Now listen, and listen carefully!
Get Beefy Borden on the wire from where you are —I don't care where he is, but get him — and keep the line open, waitine! I'm going to call you again in ten minutes, from some phoceelse. You better have lum when I do! And he better have Johnny Donovan still alive for me!"

"I don't know whatcha talking

"I don't know whatcha talking about," he tried to say. "Who's Johnny Donovan? And for that mat-

"He's thinks I'm ribbing!" she raged at Mrs. Borden. "Tell him about it yourself!"

about it yourself!"
"Dave, for God's sake, do what she says!" the haggard blonde croaked saysi the ringgard blooke cronked into the transmitter. "It's June, can't you hear me? June! She's taken me off with her in a cab and she's got a gun on me!"

lean pushed her aside. "Do you

gean pushed ner asize. Do you know who that was or don't you? Ten minutes," she warned him, and hung up. They went hustling out again, lean's right fist buried deep in the rich mink, and got back into the cab again. They lived on Fifty-eighth, she and Johnny; at least he had until two weeks ago. All his things were still up there, and it had broken her heart nightly for fourteen nights now just to look at them. Just one-room-and, but in a fairly dick place, the Pare

One orde.

She brought out all the rest of the Miami money, spread it out farwise in her hard, offered it to the driver. "Itelp yourself" and forget all about what you've seen tonight!" Mrs. Boden was too near proximation by now to budge, even without a gun on her. "One from each end and one from the middle," he gloated, pocking them out, "and I get a radio put in." She crammed the rest of it back into her bag. There was still more than enough left to get them to Miami the thing was, would she get the chance to use it? Too late, up the elevator, June Bore chance to use it?

Too late, in the elevator, June Borden came to. "Don't let her take me in there! She's — I dunno what she's gonna dol"

"All this row just because I bring you home to put you under a cold shower! You will mix your drinks!"

She slipped a ten into the hallinin's hand. He grinned reassuringly. "You'll be all right in the morning, lady," He gave Jean the office. "Mrs. Donovan would not think of hurting ya, wouldja, Mrs. Donovan? You just do what she tells ya!"

Lean closed the door after them and

Jean closed the door after them and locked it. "Sit down in that chair and let's find out if you live or die." She got the Wicked Nincties back.

while she waited. She opened her bug twith one hand and took the gun out. it Bannerman had a voice waiting for it, her on another wire, but they couldn't connect the two lines. She hadn't thought of that in time. So near and e yet so far! "Plug me through the club switchboard!" she rasped.

"I don't know how, I never worked it!" He tred it and she found herself talking to a produce market up in the Bronx. She got him back again, her heart turne usade out. "Is he alive

heart turning inside out. "Is he alive — only tell me that, is he alive?" "I can't swing it while both lines

"Listen," lean said. "Pull out his plug on your caliboard, got that? Then cut mine into the socket you ept his out of - that's all you've got voice came on. It was Borden's, Sho knew it just by that one "Who the hell wazzat?" he'd thrown after her in the club alley one night. It echoed bollowly, as though he was in some sort of a big hall or arena, "All right, handing out?" "You've not Johnny Donovan there with you, I've got June Borden here with me. Do we swap, or don't

"Trying to do, throw a scare into me? You'll wish you'd never been born when I get through with -" her like blazes while you're trying to string me along, Listen, you could be right at the door now and you wouldn't be in time to save her. Matter, clon't you believe I've got her here2 Don't you believe Bannerman?

All right, help yourself," She mo-"Max! Max!" his wife bleated. "I'm alone with her here - she came and took me out of my bed, Max. don't you know my yoke? Max, drunken circle, bands beeled to her lean picked it up again. His voice get away with -" "You're gonna hear the shot right something that went through her like a knife. The scream of a man in mortal agony sounded somewhere in the background, muffled, blurred in transmission. She moaned in answer to it. Borden said, almost hysterically, "Wait a minute, wait a minute, that wasn't him, that was one of my own men - he, he got hurt here!" "Then put ham on the phone," she said. "I'll count five. Come over here, her!" She heran to count, slowly, remorselessly. The woman was half dead already, with sheer fright. the wire, hourse, rasping. The tension was almost unendurable; she could feel

"Four," she heard herself say, "Better put him on the phone quick!" "I can't." came from the other end. "He's gone - half an hour ago. You're - too late" There was a eboked terror about the way he said it that told her it was true. She let the His wife read her doom in her eyes, She gave a single, long-drawn scream air. Then the pounding at the door told Jean why he'd come out with it like that just now, made no bones about it: they'd traced her fast, all right. They'd gotten here already - her address was on tap at the club but just the same, he'd timed himself still a door between, and a pen can fall on a cartridge much quicker than a door can swing open! She'd been half a minute too soon! They'd both lost, and the winner was the same old

A passkey turned in the door and

"lean!" She shivered all over and turned to look, and the hallman was holding Johnny up in the doorway. He was naked under a coat, and his feet were hobbled with copper wire, but his eves were alive and he grouned it again, "Jean!" as the man brought him into the room, leaning on him.

He'd kent his word, he'd stayed alive! She saw through the open coat hack a scream. "They strapped the hell out of me," he said, and smiled a little, "but — but — I left before the finals -" And he fainted.

"Whisky!" she said, "Bandages - they're in there! Quick!" Yet it wasn't as had as it had looked. Cut-up wrists and ankles, a flaming chest and abdomen - but he'd staved alive, he'd come back from a ride. The very same maroon death car was at the door right now! She nitched the gun into a corner. Mrs. Borden was sitting there snuffling a little. slowly calming down. She didn't make a move to so; seemed to be lost in thought - unpleasant thought.

He opened his eyes again, gave a deep sigh, like pain was a habit by this time. She gave him the cigarette he asked for, then went ahead washing and bandaging. Tears were slowly coursing down her cheeks, tears of gratitude. "No - no cops," she said to the hallman, "You see, it wouldn't do us any good. We're going to Miami. Can you make Penn Station with me, darling?"

He didn't tell her what they had intended doing: just told her what they'd actually done, "They kent sprinkling salt, as the belt buckle opened the skin. I gave a heave, I guess, I don't know; threw the one that was holding me down with his The buckle coming down caught him. pain, went for Beefy; picked up a sharp knife they had waiting for me. They had a terrible time with him. My arms were free, but my feet weren't. I kept rolling over and over - just to ease the burning at first then I rolled right onto this flat freight-elevator that had no sides, illed the rope and went all the way down, into the basement without knowing it. The car was there they'd brought me in, and the mechanic was dozing. I cracked him with a wrench, dragged myself in, drave it onto the elevator and managed to get off with it at street level. Then I drove it all the way back here with a blanket around me, so I wouldn't get pinched for indecent exposure. The open air sort of kept me going —"

sort of kept me going —"
"It's my fault. Are you sorry," she sobbed, "you went straight?"

"No," be murmured. "It was worth it — even if I hadn't come back. Just help me with a pair of socks and shoes, and I can still make the train

Mrs. Borden was saying, in a strange smoldering voice, "I never thought he'd go that far — do that to any human being. At home he wouldn't hurt a fly — "She covered her eyes suddenly, as if to shut out the memory of Johnny's frayed, red.

from sight. "He — he would've killed you, if you hadn't gotten away!" "That," said Johnny tersely, "seems to have been the chief idea."

"Why?" she wanted to know.
"Because I knew too much."

She seemed to be talking to herself more than to the two of them. "Oh, I'm not a plaster saint, God knows," she groaned. "I knew our money wasn't straight. I've always known it. Too much of it too quickly. I knew he was in heer back in the Twenties, and I know that lately he's been running clubs and sending girls on South American vaudeville

"Is that the new name for it?"
"But still and all," she went on,
I never thought he'd try to take someone's life. Oh, if someone doesn't stop him, be'll kill someone yet!" All Johnny said was, "Yet?" She stood up suddenly, staring at

She stood up suddenly, sturing a herady fixed him. "Then you men he has — already? Me and the kids, we been him on home of the great herady for her has been column to read the reason now why so many times the morning paper has whole column to rou of it when I come to read it." She stared at the mink cost; updied sloughed it off, horrified. "What' that trying to tell me? It's turning red, look at it, height red!" six seramed. "I've been living in the seramed." Eve been living in the same house with a killer—sleeping with a murderer! He's gonna end up in the chair yet—"

"He's ten years overdue," Johnny muttered. "It's pretty late in the day to —"

"But it's not too late! I love him! I don't care what he's done! I'll save him from that. Anything but that! I'll put him where he's safe! If I can't have him, the chair won't get him either!" She picked up Jean's phone. "Get me the district attorney's office," she solbed. Jean was buttoning her husband's Jean was buttoning her husband's cost. "Lean on me, darling," she whispered. "We've got a date with ourselves down in Mami."

"Mrs. Maximilian Borden," the woman at the phone was saying as they limped out of the room arm-in-arm and quietly closed the door behind them. "You tell the attorney I want a personal interview with him in strict confidence!"

ALL 3 BOOKS FREE! Full-Size Publishers' Editions. A '7'

Why Daes the Detective Book Club Make This Unusual Offer?

tive Advantages ALL FREE as a membership gift from the Detec-

oune any better. And now you can have all 5

How This Clab Brings You The Bast MEW Mustarias nch, Ellery Ouces, Murros G. Eberhart, or

SENT: NO MONEY! Somely mad postcated promot DETECTIVE BOOK CLUB

Mail Pasteerd NOW Far Accept your FRET expect of these

One Perk Avenue, New York 16, New York

Please enrolline as a member and tone ma, FRAE, is myster publishers' editions, the I am not abligated to mee every morehly triple volume, and may cappel whenever I I will receive an advancy description of all furthcoming selections and may report

FREE-Three Brand-New Mystery Novels DETECTIVE BOOK CITIES One Perk Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

The Newest Childs by CORNELL WOODLENCH PRODUCTIONS IN BUILD STATE OF THE PRODUCTION OF THE PRODUCTION

MEMI FORD

ME LOWIS STRUMBEROUS

THE LOWIS ST

THAT CLASS
PERMIT No. 7
(See Style P. B. B. V.
New York, N. Y.

BUSINESS REPLY CARD
Postage Stemp Necessary of Availed to the United

4c POSTAGE WILL BE PAID BY

ONE PARK AVENUE

Inside cerer

STCARD

O STAMP

EQUIRED